A LETTER,

&c.

MY DEAREST FRIEND,

WE have, these many years, felt alike on all things which concern the Church, the progress of Christ's kingdom, the cure of souls; so that it is natural to write to you on any new trouble which comes upon us. But in this case we have another common bond, the souls and consciences of those to whom we have ministered, and who now are liable to be disquieted, and are (as you tell me) in part disquieted by the theory of "jurisdiction," recently put out by Mr. Allies. This, as he has too narrowly stated it, would, in many cases, affect the "benefits of Absolution," which, by virtue of the exhortation of the Church of England, they have sought and received, and in it have found grace and peace. One, at least, has on that ground left the Church of England.

I have also been called upon in a written letter to answer the same question, with the intimation that the writers "purposed to make public both their question and my answer." The substance of that letter too has been made known, and souls, in whom we have both a deep interest, have been disquieted. It became the more necessary to answer it as fully as I could. Brief questions on what relates to doctrine or to the soul, often require long answers. An objection may be put in few words. In order to meet it satisfactorily, it is often necessary to enter into the whole subject. I have, in consequence, at such fragments of time as other duties and the present troubles of the Church have permitted, read through, I believe, what has been written on the subject by those of most name and weight. And now, having collected the materials, I prefer, for reasons which I need not enter into, writing the result to you.

To you, as well as to myself, many whose consciences were oppressed have come, at the invitation of our common Mother, who, consulting for the infirmity of her children, did not place them, in this respect, simply under their Parish Priest, but directed him to invite them to "come to him or to some other," to whom they could, with full confidence, unburden their souls. They came to us in simple trust in the loving invitation of the Church; and we, in the same entire confidence that the Church, by bidding them come, did not empower only, but laid a necessity upon us, to receive them, did so receive and minister to them, as the Church directed. You too can bear witness with me, that if there is one part of our Ministry which God has blessed; if there be one part of our office, as to the fruits of which we look with hopefulness and joy to the day of judgment, it is to the visible cleansing of souls, the deepened penitence, "the repentance unto salvation not to be repented of," the hope in Christ, the freshness of grace, the joy of forgiven souls, the evident growth in holiness, the Angel-joy "over each sinner that repenteth," which this ministry has disclosed to us. We have often in the subsequent growth in grace and "transformation" of the soul, by the "renewing of the mind," not been able to recall to ourselves the former self which we knew of, when first a person sought to hear, through our ministry, his Saviour's Voice, "Thy sins be forgiven thee: go in peace."

"In these a Pastor dare delight
A lamb-like, Christ-like throng;"

for His likeness has anew by Himself been traced upon them.

For these souls we should especially be anxious, that no breath of unreal doubt or misgiving should cloud the brightness of their hopes; no untrue questioning pierce their souls. We have seen the reality of the work of the Divine Grace in their souls. We have seen it too uniformly, too vividly, too variedly, too abounding in manifold fruits, as "God divideth to every man severally as he will," to have a shadow of doubt about it. To us all questioning seems like calling in question the work of God the Holy Ghost, "which our own eyes have seen." When we see the dry and parched ground clad with verdure which gladdens the eye, we doubt not that God hath "sent a gracious rain upon His inheritance, and refreshed it when it was weary." When we see the fever abate, the wasted form recover strength, the sunken eye look full and thankful to Heaven, we doubt not of His Hand who "bringeth down to the ground and bringeth up." When we hear how one bowed down lifted up herself, how the blind saw, the lepers were cleansed, the deaf heard, we know from Whom virtue went forth to heal them. When we see spiritual cures, the spiritual sight restored, the taste in heavenly things given back, the senses deadened to the things of sense, the conscience once dulled, now tender; the proud heart, like a little child; the hardened heart flow in tears of penitence; the soul more alive to its remaining infirmities, than it once was to whole heaps of deep deadly sin; or that great triumph of Divine Power, where one becomes eminent for the grace most opposed to his deepest besetting fault, we must adore the miracles of Divine Grace. Satan does not cast out Satan. It was His Name, through faith in His Name, which gave them their spiritual life and power and victory in Him.

But to many of these, the very humility which God has given them may hide His own work in them. With quickened sight they see defects to which they once were blind. Longing to be wholly pure and wholly God's, they feel keenly every thing which seems in any degree to separate them from Him. They feel the remaining sinfulness of their corrupt nature, and the penalty even of forgiven sin, and the evil, though unharboured, thoughts which issue from it, more than they once did actual grievous sin. They cannot have the cumulative evidence which we have of the "benefit of Absolution." They have felt in their own case "the power of God unto salvation." Yet it would seem presumptuous to rest on their own experience, as to the gift of God. But we have seen that ministry effectual, not in the one or the other case, but wherever it has been sought "with a faithful and true heart."

These souls then we must guard with care. For the slightest misgiving will pierce tender souls, in proportion to their tenderness.

The inquiry involves necessarily a good deal of reference to a system, which is distinct from our own, as being compulsory. For the objections raised by Mr. Allies are drawn entirely from writers who lived after the Council of Lateran had enjoined "Confession to every one's own Priest once in the year," and they must be removed out of the same sources. This I hope to do, by God's help, upon their own principles; but in doing so, I must be understood to employ these writers as witnesses, not as wishing to bring in any theory, or practice, different from that acknowledged by the English Church. We have both felt that the restoration of Confession has been the work of God on the souls of men. Confession has been with us purely voluntary. Both of us have received those who came to us. We dared not, when our Lord's wounded sheep came to us, as invited by His Church, incur that woe: "The diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye sought that which was lost." (Ezek. xxxiv. 4.)

But we have not enjoined¹ "auricular confession;" nor do we wish to bring back any compulsory system. We wish, while there is time, to awaken those "dead in trespasses and sins;" and with the medicine which He has given, to "heal the broken in heart, and bind up their wounds."

Further results belong not to us, but to the

Church and to God, in whose hands she and we are. I state this, because this letter may fall into the hands of those to whom both the language and the authorities will seem equally strange.

Before entering upon the subject itself, it is best, for the sake of those not familiar with the distinction which Mr. Allies has applied to the English Church, to restate the point at issue. We both, then, believe in common, that the power to absolve from sin in Christ's Name, is given to all priests through their ordination. We believe that this power is committed to them by Christ Himself, through the imposition of the Bishop's hands with the words, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. 'Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained.'" We both of us believe that the power of excommunicating or absolving from excommunication is reserved for the highest order only. We both believe that on full confession of all the sins which burthen the conscience, with true repentance, the priest may, by Christ's "authority committed unto him, absolve" the penitent "from all his sins, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;" and that what he "looses on earth" is "loosed in heaven."

The question raised relates to a further point. It is whether, without any further commission, the priest may in any case (besides the point of death) exercise the power thus lodged in him, and, by his Office, inherent in him; or whether the power lies, as it were, dormant in him, and may not be put forth without some further direct commission from the Bishop; and whether, if exercised without such further authorization, it is valid.

It is true, that the exercise of the power given to the priests by ordination may be suspended, or even taken away. The first Schoolman who wrote on this subject after the Council of Lateran, Alex. Alensis, illustrates the case by that of a hand holding a material key². A priest degraded loses the power altogether, like a hand amputated; a heretical priest has it suspended, until he be restored to the Church, like a paralytic hand, until its power be restored by fresh influence from the body; a priest suspended, is like a hand tied; a monk who is also ordained, being engaged in contemplation and solitary life, is like a hand otherwise employed, and cannot use the keys, except it be allowed through obedience to the superior.

The image is one strikingly adapted to illustrate the nature of Jurisdiction. The priest holds the keys, and has authority to use them; but that use may be limited or restrained. Jurisdiction has two aspects, positive and negative. It may be looked upon as the concession of a power, or as its restriction within certain limits. By Consecration, God confers upon a

Bishop, authority to ordain, confirm, and exercise all other Episcopal acts. By Ordination, He confers on the priest power to consecrate the Holy Eucharist, to absolve and bless in His Name. But God is a God of order: and so, for the order and well-being of the whole Church, each office is exercised, with certain limitations, within certain bounds. Patriarchs, Metropolitans, Archbishops, Bishops, Presbyters—all alike have their limits, in that their authority is restricted so that it should not interfere with others who have the same office.

This principle, that none should interfere with another's office, is laid down in the earliest Canons of the Church. It was one and the same principle in all, that none should "remove³ the ancient landmark which thy fathers have set," nor "thrust⁴ his sickle into another's harvest."

Thus the 34th Apostolic Canon forbids Bishops to "ordain beyond their own boundaries, for cities not subject to them; if any be convicted to have done this against the will of those who rule those cities or countries, let him and those whom he has ordained be deposed."

The Council of Antioch enlarged this (Can. 13): "If a Bishop, uncalled, go in a disorderly way to ordain or to settle ecclesiastical matters which do not belong to him, let what he doth be null, and himself, subject to the punishment which befits his disorderly and lawless undertaking, be deposed from this very time by the Holy Synod." And again in Can. 22: "A Bishop may not invade another's city not subject to him, nor a country which appertaineth not to him, to ordain any; nor may he appoint presbyters or deacons for places subject to another Bishop, except with the good will of the Bishop of the country. But if he venture this, let his ordination be null, and himself be rebuked by the Synod."

The Council of Nice lays down the same principle as to Patriarchates: "Let the ancient customs prevail, those in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, so that the Bishop of Alexandria should have authority over all, since this is customary also, as to the Bishop of Rome. In like way also, as to Antioch, and in the other provinces, let the churches have their dignities unharmed."

The 1st Council of Constantinople (Can. 2) renews this: "Let the Bishops over a diocese not enter upon the Churches beyond its boundaries, nor confuse the Churches; but according to the Canons, let the Bishop of Alexandria administer the affairs in Egypt only; and the Bishops of the East govern the East only (the dignities assigned to the Church of Antioch in the Nicene Canons being preserved); let the Bishops, too, of the diocese of Asia order the affairs in Asia only; those of Pontus, Pontus only; those of Thrace, Thrace only. But let not Bishops over a diocese, uncalled, enter another for ordination, or any other ecclesiastical office. But the above

Canon about the dioceses being observed, it is plain that the Synod of the province should order the things in each province, according to what was ordained at Nicaea. But the Churches of God in the barbarian nations must be ordered according to the prevailing practice of the fathers."

In like way the Council of Ephesus, in vindicating the independence of the Bishops of Cyprus from the see of Antioch, lays down the general principle. "The same shall be carefully observed in the other dioceses also, and all the provinces, so that no one of the Bishops most beloved of God shall take possession of another province which has not of old and from the beginning been under those before him. But if any have taken possession of one, and by force brought it under himself, he shall give it back, that the Canons of the fathers be not transgressed, nor under the pretext of the priesthood, the swelling pride of worldly power creep in, and that we lose not, little by little, and imperceptibly, that freedom which our Lord Jesus Christ, the Deliverer of all men, hath bestowed upon us through His own Blood. It seemed good then to the holy and Œcumenical Synod, that to each province the rights which belong to it of old from the first, according to the practice which prevailed of old, be preserved pure and inviolate."

Of these, the Canons of Antioch and Constantinople are quoted in the Decretals⁵, together with decrees as to judgments of Bishops, as involving one and the same principle, that no one is to invade the province of another. The decrees as to Bishops here ascribed to Pope Calixtus, are but modifications of the Apostolic Canon and those of Antioch by the Pseudo-Isidore; another ascribed to Pope Urban II. is perhaps from an uncertain collection of Canons. But all are put under one common head, which shows what is there meant. "That no Bishop or any superior should ordain the clerks of another without his leave." It is a principle of not meddling with the office committed to another.

It will make my meaning clearer to add here those other decrees, attributed to Calixtus, under the same head.

"Let no one usurp the bounds of another, nor presume to judge, or ordain, or excommunicate one in the diocese of another [alterius parochianum]; for such judgment, or ordination, or excommunication, or condemnation, shall neither hold, nor have any force; because no one shall be bound or condemned by the sentence of another judge than his own. Whence the Lord also speaketh, saying, 'Thou shall not transgress the ancient landmarks which thy fathers have placed.'

"Let no primate, no metropolitan, none of the other Bishops go to a city of another, or take possession of a district which doth not appertain unto him and belongs to another Bishop, to order any thing; unless called by him to whose right it is known to belong;

nor let him dispose, order, or judge any thing there, if he willeth to retain the dignity of his order. But if he shall presume to do otherwise, he shall be condemned, and not he only, but those who co-operate with him, because as ordination, so also judging and the disposition of other things is forbidden them. For he who cannot ordain, how can he judge? No wise, doubtless, should he or can he judge."

To these are appended three Paleæ, whose authority, as being Paleæ, is perhaps less. These I will insert when I come to the subject itself. All three in common forbid interference with others. The one which relates to confession, of the 11th century, refers to a case of interference of a most mischievous sort, when a penitent who had placed himself under the care of one priest, withdraws himself from him. The other two forbid presbyters or deacons receiving to mass the parishioner of another.

Thus from the highest to the lowest, from the Patriarch to the Deacon, for ordaining, judging, excommunicating, absolving, admitting to hear mass, there is one principle throughout, that, in the army of the Church, "each should march on his ways, and no one break his ranks: neither shall one thrust another⁶."

To this belongs the case of the late Bishop Coleridge, which Mr. Allies brings forward to illustrate the nature of jurisdiction. He says: "A Bishop⁷ who had resigned a colonial see was lately resident in a country parish, yet, though superior in power of order to the parish priest, he could perform no one act in that Parish involving jurisdiction save by the permission of the parish priest."

⁶ Joel ii. 7, 8.

This is strictly on the principle of non-interference. A Bishop who, like St. Gregory of Nazianzum, resigns his cure, has none of his own. But then, Dioceses or Parishes being apportioned, he cannot, uninvited, exercise any part either of his Episcopal or his priestly office in other Dioceses or Parishes, without interfering with the office in the Lord's Vineyard assigned to others. This does not belong to acts involving jurisdiction only, but to all acts which have been assigned to another, because they have been so assigned. He could not, without irregularity, baptize (except in peril of death), nor confirm, nor ordain, nor preach, in the Diocese or Parish of another, except by his permission, because another has been appointed to perform these offices. All these would come under the rule of not "thrusting his sickle into another's harvest." On the other hand, if an act has not been specially assigned to the Parish Priest, but he is required by the law of the Church to admit others to the performance of that act, then he has not exclusive jurisdiction in this act, and that other has all the jurisdiction necessary for that act from the law of the Church. The Bishop could not regularly, out of his diocese, perform offices which interfered with the office of another: he could absolve, on confession, before Holy Communion, because, according to the law of the English Church, it is no interference. This I hope to explain hereafter.

The same principle is laid down by Gratian, in another part of the decretals, in which the reconciliation of the excommunicate is forbidden to Presbyters. It is forbidden as part of the Episcopal office.

“That one excommunicated by the Bishop may not be reconciled by another, without consulting him, unless perchance by his Metropolitan, or by the supreme Pontiff, is proved by reason and authority. For presbyters receive power of excommunicating and reconciling from Bishops, not Bishops from presbyters; and therefore priests can reconcile those excommunicated by priests; but those excommunicated by Bishops, priests cannot reconcile. For the reconciliation of penitents is part of the episcopal, not the priestly office.”

The details which Gratian gives here, will come to be considered hereafter. This will suffice to explain what I conceive to be the principle involved. The Church has power to regulate and limit the functions of her ministers, or again to remove those limitations. Thus, strictly as the rule that one Bishop should not enter upon the diocese of another was enforced in the African Church, the case was excepted if a Bishop should not be diligent in converting the heathen within it. The Church, in this case, interfered, that the power given for the saving of souls, should not be retained to their loss.

But if the Church makes any regulations, then she may either make void, ipso facto, what is done contrary to them; or she may annul it afterwards, so that it should remain valid, until, or unless she annuls it. Again, she may, if she see good, change those regulations, so as to make them more or less stringent. It is acknowledged, on all hands, that considerable changes have been made in the penitential discipline. While public penitence was enforced, one who had publicly offended could not be admitted to communion, without undergoing that course of penitence. What was condemned as irregular then, is the received practice in the Roman Communion now. The Church may adapt herself to the necessities of the times, within certain limits, and bend to what her children will endure, lest by a severity healthful in itself, yet unsuited to their weakness, she risk their salvation, leaving them to plunge into a heathen life or into schism.

The letter sent to me puts apparently but one question; "Has the Church of England left the power of the keys, unrestrained, in the hands of her presbyters, so that they may use it freely for all who come to unburthen their griefs to them?" A second perhaps lies involved in it, any how in Mr. Allies' pamphlet, "Has the Church of England the right to leave the power of absolving, freely in the hands of her presbyters, without restricting them?"

To both these questions I can, without hesitation, answer "Yes." And so I might dispense with a third statement, that even if such exercise of her office had been irregular, it would not follow that the acts would be invalid, unless subsequently invalidated by authority. They would stand, unless rescinded.

To take them in order.

After mentioning the Constitution of Archbishop Reynolds^s (Abp. A.D. 1313—1327), he says,

“We have not overlooked the sentence in the exhortation appointed in the Common Prayer Book before Communion. ‘Let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned minister of God’s word, and open his grief, &c. &c.’ But, after the best consideration in our power, we have come to the conclusion that so far from weakening the difficulties which we have suggested, it strengthens their force. The words ‘some other’ &c., would, of course, be intended to be understood only in the sense of the common practice and discipline of that time, 1548, in this matter: and we believe there is not any doubt whatever what that practice and discipline were; so that the ‘some other’ &c. would of necessity be a priest, who had been appointed by the Bishop, for that diocese or district.”

In their plain and natural sense, the words “Let him come unto me, or unto some other discreet and learned minister of God’s word,” do (as all must have felt, and as we have all shown by our actions, whether in confessing or in receiving confessions,) leave it quite open to any of us to choose whom we think best fitted for our own case: they almost oblige us to receive any who come to us. This we have acted upon, and the interpretation which thousands have, unbiassed, put upon the words, is a strong testimony that such is their real meaning. It is assumed, however, in Mr. Allies' letters, that their meaning must be, not what they would obviously mean, in the present day, but whatever was meant by them, when they were first used. And this he fixes at 1548, the date of the first Communion Office under Edward VI.

This date is essential to his argument. For at any later time it is quite plain that there was no priest appointed for "each diocese and district," and so that the Church could not mean to restrict the liberty of choice, left to the laity, in the way that he would limit those larger words.

And therefore he takes exclusively this date, in order to obtain a contemporaneous exposition corresponding with the view which he has taken of the necessity of jurisdiction to the right exercise of the power of the keys.

But, 1st, he has mistaken the practice antecedent to the Reformation to which he appeals, as explaining the words in the Prayer Book of 1548.

2. Even at this date, the words would not restrain the freedom of choice now allowed.

3. There is no ground for fixing this date exclusively, but the contrary.

I. In order to ascertain this contemporary practice, it is necessary to begin with the period immediately antecedent to the Reformation. In so doing, I must waive, for the time, the consideration of that period, upon which the Church of England rests her practice, the centuries antecedent to the Council of Lateran, and will take the practice established by that Council. Reserving, then, the consideration of the primitive practice, and its bearings upon the present question, I would now take the case subsequent to the Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215, simply as illustrative of the point referred to, i. e. who (according to that rule) the “some other discreet and learned Priest” would be.

The Council of Lateran established in this respect two points. (1.) “Let all the faithful of both sexes, as soon as they come to years of discretion, faithfully confess all their sins in private, at least once a year, to their own priest.” (2.) “If any one for a just reason desire to confess his sins to a priest not his own, let him first ask and obtain leave from his own priest, inasmuch as otherwise the other cannot absolve or bind him.” I waive now, as I said, the question as to the previous state of things, and take only that, which existed between 1215 and 1548, subsequent to the Council of Lateran, and anterior to the Council of Trent.

The rule then was established, that all must confess to their own priest once in the year, and none must leave that priest for another without his leave ;

otherwise the Church pronounced that the absolution which he obtained would not be valid. This states the duty of parishioners, and this is the point which was enacted in this country in the Constitution of Archbishop Reynolds, quoted by Mr. Allies. (Abp. A.D. 1313—1327.) “Let⁹ no priest admit to penitence the parishioner of another, except with the permission of his own presbyter or Bishop.”

This so far describes, then, the duty of parishioners. They might not go to another priest, without the leave of their own, or (if there were any occasion for the higher authority to supersede the lower) of the Bishop. But what if they had the leave of their Parish Priest? This is the question at issue. For (as I shall show) that leave might be given either individually, or generally, to a whole parish, or by law or by custom.

The 2nd Constitution of Archbishop Reynolds¹⁰, which Mr. Allies quotes, appointing confessors, relates solely to the Clergy, and the “two fitting Presbyters of competent knowledge and approved character” were to hear their confessions only.

The Constitution is directed against the practice of the secular Clergy, either not confessing at all, or going to the monks at their own option. It is an application, as to these, of the Council of Lateran, that none should admit to penitence any one, subject to another.

⁹ In Lyndwode de poen. et rem. c. Sacerdos, f. 179. v. ed. 1501.

¹⁰ Ibid. c. Cum sæpe, f. 181. v.

In none of these is there any provision as to the case of those who in any way had leave, not to confess to their own priest. This Mr. Allies supplies from the "instructions of Pope Eugenius IV. to the Armenians," which, Le Plat says¹, "is not to be confounded with the Council of Florence," A.D. 1439. In these it is laid down, "The minister of this Sacrament is a priest, having authority to absolve, either ordinary, or by the commission of his superior;" and subsequently to these times, the Council of Trent laid down, "that the absolution must be held to be of no force, which a priest pronounces on one, over whom he has not ordinary or delegated jurisdiction." But the very question is, what is "delegated jurisdiction?" And by whom is it delegated? by the Priest, or by the Bishop, or by the Church? or by each in different cases? directly only, or indirectly?

To this question I would now proceed. But it may save much confusion, first of all to consider the meaning of the word "Jurisdiction" which occurs very often in Mr. Allies' letter, but which is not so plain to ordinary readers as he has imagined. There are, in the later Roman Church, three chief different views of Jurisdiction as relates to the power of the keys. It has been held, (1.) that the power of the keys and Jurisdiction are both given, by Divine right², to Priests in their Ordination, liable to subsequent limitation by the Church, but free and complete until or unless so limited; or (2.) that the power of the keys is given by Christ Himself in Ordination, but Jurisdiction, by a subsequent act by the Church³; or (3.) that both are given by Ordination, yet so that they should be exercised upon those whom the Church should assign. And to this last I may add, that either the positive law of the Church [jus], or (when not contradicted by that law) received custom [consuetudo], are considered sufficient to constitute Jurisdiction.

Of these the first and the third virtually coincide in principle. They differ as to fact. In the first, it is asserted that, for a long time, nearly thirteen centuries, no such limitation was imposed. In the third it is asserted, on the authority chiefly of the false Decretals, that at no time did the Church leave persons absolutely free. But they agree in this, that when the Church has limited it, Absolution can only be validly given, in conformity with those limitations.

The meaning of the word jurisdiction, then, may "no confessor, be he who he may, when he absolves, ought to say, 'by the authority of the Bishop or Curate,' " &c. (Ap. Nav. in c. placuit, n. 46.)

be resolved into these two : (1.) an authority vested in each Priest, which he may exercise whenever any one (according to the law of the Church) submits himself to it. (2.) “An authority over certain individuals given to a certain priest.”

1. In the first of these senses, De Palude and Navarrus, and ultimately Vazquez (correcting all his predecessors, on both sides), illustrate the jurisdiction given to Priests in Ordination, by the Office of the Chartulary Judges.

“These” (I will use the words of Vazquez¹) “had power from the Sovereign to judge in the causes of those who were willing to submit themselves to them. These then had from the King power to give judgment [jus dicere], and so jurisdiction; for jurisdiction is nothing else than the office or faculty of giving judgment, or pronouncing sentence, as all skilled in Latin, and in civil and canon law, teach. So, then, this only was lacking to them, that the Emperor did not designate to them any one in particular, i.e. no prisoners to be judged, no matter on whom to exercise their power. But the Emperor only assigned to them in common whosoever wished to subject themselves to their judgment. When, then, any subjected themselves, they did not give to the Chartulary Judges power of giving judgment. For this they had from the Emperor. But they furnished a definite matter for judging, which the Emperor did not define, but left to be defined by the will of those who wished to be judged ; which matter failing, their power could not be exercised, because, besides that power, there was required a definite matter, in order that the exercise of that power might ensue.

“ Much of this sort is the case with Priests. For in their Ordination they receive orders, not only as regards the power of consecrating, but as regards the power of giving judgment as to sins, when it is said to each, ‘ Receive the Holy Ghost ; whose sins ye remit they are remitted, &c.’ By which words he is made a Chartulary judge, and receives authority to give judgment as to sins ; and this power, which is required on the part of the judge, and which is truly called jurisdiction, the Priest cannot receive from the Church ; for then he would have from the Church the power of judging, which is false.”

Vazquez goes on to say, that priests had not from Christ, in ordination, jurisdiction by Divine right over all who willed to submit themselves to them, as to Chartulary judges. For if they had, then the Church could not limit this right ; as no Prince inferior to the Emperor could take away or narrow the jurisdiction given by the Emperor. Jurisdiction, then, he holds, to be given to Priests in ordination ; so that it is not given afterwards, but only persons are assigned towards whom it may be exercised. But these (as I shall show hereafter) may be assigned either definitely or vaguely, by law or by custom.

And with this even Suarez agrees, in fact, so as to regard it as a question of words, whether it be said that priests have jurisdiction given to them in Ordination itself by Christ, and that the Church directs who should be subject to it, or that the Church confers jurisdiction. He states the opinion thus: "As⁵ those Chartulary judges had power from the Emperors, so now Priests have it from Christ; and as they, from the grant of the Emperors alone, had not any subject to that power, so neither have Priests from the force of ordination alone."

De Palude and Navarrus carried that analogy of the Chartulary judges further, and said that Priests have this power towards any one who places himself under them. Suarez says, it differs in this, that, in the Church, persons have not the option, which they had by that secular law in the things of secular law, to submit to whom they will, but that the Church decides to whom they are to submit themselves. Yet in that Navarrus says, "those who lawfully [legitimè] submit themselves, he must mean the same thing; since 'lawfully' is according to the law of the Church, in whatever way this be ascertained, whether by positive law or custom⁶."

2. The second sense of jurisdiction occurs in the following passage of Dom. Soto: "A person's⁷ own Priest [proprius sacerdos] is one who can by his jurisdiction compel one under him [subditum ejus, 'his subject,' as Mr. Allies says] to the Sacrament," i. e. Confession. In this sense, Jurisdiction, of course, must be given by a subsequent act. It is not a right only to receive penitents who willingly submit themselves; but a power to compel persons to submit to the discipline of the Church by making confession as the Church appoints, and, in the actual discipline established by the Council of Lateran, yearly. This power, can of course, be fully vested in one person only.

Gregory de Valentia reduces this authority "over" the person to be simply "lawful authority" in this matter. "The^s power of jurisdiction we call some above, it appears that every Priest has jurisdiction in the Penitential Court; nay, that is conferred upon him, annexed to orders, although he hath not the exercise of it, save over those who are lawfully placed under him. Yea, he seems to have it together with the exercise towards a certain class of men, so far at least, that without leave from any one he can hear, and loose, and bind them. As those in extremities, or who, since their last confession, have committed venial sins only; Bishops, or their superiors, and other prelates immediately subject to the Pope. And so they are a sort of chartulary judges, whose jurisdiction can be enlarged (according to l. 1, and the notes there by Bartholus and all, which holds in spirituals with leave of the superior). So then this too can be extended, although he exercises no other cure of souls." Ib. n. 52.

sort of authority towards the other, as one placed under him, at least as relates to that act of knowing his conscience, and loosing and binding." And in a case where the law did not interfere to prohibit it, he admits that the voluntary submission of the individual gives sufficient "jurisdiction," as in the case of slighter sins. "Of those [venial sins] which the penitent confesseth voluntarily, he can with a certain jurisdiction and authority inquire into those things which he thinks to appertain to the right execution of his office, and to helping the penitent. And this right [jus] the Confessor acquires, provided that the penitent himself (as relates to such confession) hath of his own accord subjected himself to the Confessor. For by this very act he giveth power to the Confessor of executing his office after some sort with a certain authority."

This distinction is of great importance as regards the Church of England, that we may not apply to her, rules which belong to a different system. The Parish Priest in England is not the "proprius sacerdos" of the Council of Lateran. For the "proprius sacerdos" was one who might require his parishioners to confess once in the year, previous to Communion, from which if he abstained, he was, if he died, deprived of Christian burial.

Since, then, the Church of England has left it free to us to confess or no, no one is, in her, subjected to another by this sort of jurisdiction. The other sort of jurisdiction is given to all priests. The power to absolve those whom they lawfully may, is given them in ordination.

The real question then is, not whether all priests have the jurisdiction (i. e. the authority jus dicendi) necessary, but whether, or in what way, persons may lawfully (legitimè) place themselves under that authority.

It will be convenient also to notice here, that as to jurisdiction, it was regarded as one and the same thing, whether leave was given to a Priest to hear the confession of those not ordinarily placed under him, or to the penitent to confess to any such as are not ordinarily placed over him. He who could give leave in the one way, whether the Pope, or the Bishop, or the Parish Priest, could, to the same extent, give it in the other. To give a person leave to choose to whom he will confess, was held, ipso facto, to give authority to the person whom he chose, to receive that confession. Thus Suarez says ⁹:—

“Jurisdiction may be granted, or delegated, in two ways; (1.) directly, by giving jurisdiction to the Priest, as when a Parish Priest takes any qualified Priest as a coadjutor for a time, or a Bishop or the Priest commits this office to any one: (2.) on the part of the penitent, as when a faculty of choosing a Confessor is granted to any one.” And on this 2nd mode, “Man¹ can give this faculty. For there is no more ground against delegating this jurisdiction in this way, than in the other. Whence the same power is required in a Prelate of the Church, or Pastor, to grant this faculty, as is necessary to delegate jurisdiction. The same power also suffices; for it has, as I said, the same effect. It is of no moment in which way it takes place, nor doth it require greater jurisdiction. So then, whosoever hath ordinary jurisdiction in this Court in regard of the faithful, can give them the power of choosing a Confessor; provided that the Curate has the conditions requisite to enable him to delegate his jurisdiction to him. For this condition is always to be understood. As, conversely, so often as an ordinary Pastor delegates his jurisdiction to a Priest, it is necessarily understood to be relatively to those faithful, who are subject to his jurisdiction: for those two, as I said, are correlative and connected. So, then, each of those ordinary Pastors [the Pope, the Bishop, the Parish Priest,] can give this faculty. For each is an ordinary superior in this Court. So, then, on the one hand, he can give the faculty; on the other, because he has the ordinary power, he can delegate it."

Mr. Allies' perplexity has arisen, partly, in applying to a system where confession is not compulsory, maxims of a system where it is; partly, in his taking the words "delegated jurisdiction" in too narrow a sense, even on the principles acknowledged by

Roman writers themselves. For he contemplates only two cases; "ordinary jurisdiction," in which, together with the cure of souls, the Bishop gives "a part of his own ordinary jurisdiction as regards such particular souls;" or, secondly, in which he gives a "delegated jurisdiction, to one qualified by sacerdotal orders, over the whole or any portion of his flock, as to a vicar-general, or a penitentiary." To this Mr. Allies says, the only exception is, "that² any priest may absolve any penitent from any sin, in articulo mortis."

In which "particular case," he says truly, "the practice has given the jurisdiction." But then he admits another mode of conveying of jurisdiction, which materially affects the meaning in which the term must be taken, viz. practice, i. e. custom or consuetudo.

The idea of "delegated jurisdiction" (I trust to show on the authority even of Roman writers) extends even further than this too. It includes, among others, (1.) all cases in which the law of the Church gives to persons, liberty to choose for themselves. (2.) All cases in which the bishop or the parish priest himself gives leave to choose some other than the parish priest. (3.) All cases in which tacit consent is given by custom, for each person to choose for himself. In all these and other cases, this permission, whether expressed or tacit, (as in the case of "custom,") was, at the time of the Reformation, considered to convey jurisdiction to any simple priest, without cure of souls.

"It makes no difference," says Gregory de Valentia³, "whether any obtain jurisdiction from the law (jure), or from man (i. e. by the concession of the ordinary minister), or from custom, supposing he obtain it lawfully by any one or more of these ways, as appears from what is commonly disputed hereon by Doctors, especially John Medina, de Conf. qu. 31, and Soto, Dist. 18. qu. 4. Art. 2."

If the word "delegated jurisdiction" be not understood in this wider sense, the maxim which Mr. Allies quotes from the Council of Trent, would, in a number of cases, contradict the practice of the Latin Church up to that time.

These cases spread over a wide field of varied character, and many of them are not directly applicable to the present case. But they are all of importance in showing what is meant by "jurisdiction." At least, they all together show what "jurisdiction" is not essential to valid absolution; i. e. any authority over the individual himself, direct or indirect, except that "authority" which Christ has "committed to" all priests to "absolve from all their sins, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost⁴," all sinners who, with true contrition, confess their sins.

1. The case, which Roman Divines find most trouble to bring under any sense of jurisdiction is that of the Pope himself. Vazquez says that they "harass⁵ themselves extremely under it," through setting up a false principle as to jurisdiction. No one, according to them, has any jurisdiction over the Pope, whence one went so far as to say that "he need not confess at all," which Almayn⁶ declares to be heretical. I mention this extreme opinion, to show that the case is a real difficulty, according to the over-rigid interpretation of the words urged upon us, that "a Priest must have authority, ordinary or delegated, over the person whom he absolves." Others have laid down, that all Priests have "ordinary jurisdiction" over the Pope; which Dom. Soto⁷ again rejects as absurd; for then all priests would be set over him, and might compel him to use confession.

Others⁸ have said that the confessor receives special authority to that end from God. If by this, it were meant, that he received it from God Himself, then this would be a concession of the whole question, in that it would admit that jurisdiction was given by God, "apart from the Pope and the Universal Church." If it was said, that it was given by the Pope himself, (and this is said to have been at one time the common opinion,) Melchior Canus answers: "A Bishop Deacon can give to others the authority which he has not himself, to absolve those whose shepherd he is, but those only; the Supreme Pontiff is not his own shepherd or judge; therefore he cannot commit to another the power to absolve himself." Again Navarrus⁹ answers, on the principles of the law, the Pope cannot give jurisdiction over himself. "He has not jurisdiction over himself, because he has it not over a successor, (argum. l. pen. ff. de recept. arbitr. and c. innotuit de election.) and none can give what he has not." (Cap. quod autem de jure patron. l. si universæ. C. de Leg.)

Again Sylvester says, "the¹ Pope cannot be absolved in the outward court, because he cannot be bound by any excommunication, as having no superior. But in the Penitential Court, a sinner can be bound, and Christ hath not left him without remedy, but he hath a confessor, whomsoever he chooses; who, by the authority of Christ, can loose or bind him: for, as from the beginning, any priest could absolve any one who was willing to submit himself to him, so it is now as to him who is subject to none."

Others, again, used the Gallican principle that a Council was above the Pope, and said that the jurisdiction was given “not² to the Pope, but to the whole Christian Church.” And so they said that “the priest chosen by the Roman Pontiff as confessor, had jurisdiction over him by the tacit or express commission of the whole Church, because he has no superior in the Church but the Church herself.” This was, of course, opposed by those who objected to the Gallican doctrine. It admitted the principle that jurisdiction “might be given by a tacit commission;” i. e. that express delegation of authority was not required. “Most³ Italians, especially the Romans, approved of the opinion of Caietan,” viz., that “the principle of absolution lies in the power of order, not of jurisdiction; that the power of jurisdiction only concurred to this, that it placed the sinner under the other, either simply, or as to those sins. Whence towards one who could subject himself to whom he would, no jurisdiction was required in him who ministered this sacrament.” This which, Navarrus says, was extensively received, again makes it a matter of positive law; and justifies in principle, the English practice, that no special jurisdiction, beyond what is given by the law itself, is necessary in order to receive the confession of one who is free to commit himself to whom he will.

Almayn said, that “the⁴ Pope was not bound to confess to a Priest, whether ordinary or delegated, but to one freely chosen by himself.” This was to cut the knot, being, in words, directly opposed to the statement of Pope Eugenius at the Council of Florence.

⁴ In dist. 18. q. 1. Art. 4.

Navarrus lays down⁵, "that in the court of conscience the power of those who absolve is one, i. e. a ministerial [power] given by God, together with the order of the Presbyterate, although a different matter is subjected to different persons," and then infers from this "the reason⁶ why a simple Priest can absolve from sin, the Pope submitting himself to him; because the Priest, although a simple Priest, does, in absolving, rest upon the Divine authority; and to that authority, because it is Divine, the Pope can, without consent of another, submit himself, in that he has no superior, nor requireth any consent, nor is it unbefitting for him to submit himself to a Divine power."

And so, in conclusion, Vazquez admits and enforces, so far, the principle of Navarrus and others, which I have stated above, that Priests have jurisdiction given them by Christ, together with the power of the keys, in ordination, like "the chartulary judges;" but the individual over whom it is to be exercised is to be assigned to them by the Church; and that the Pope assigned himself, not giving to the Priest to whom he confessed, the active power, but submitting himself to it. And Medina argues from this very case, that any one who has leave from his own priest may confess to any Priest whatsoever without cure of souls. "This is plain," he says⁷, "secondly, from the case of the simple Priest to whom the Pope submits himself, who hath power over the Pope himself, on the simple ground and no other, that with the power of order he hath a subject matter, i. e. the Pope, who could, if he willed, subject himself to him."

"John⁸ Andreas says plainly, that since he is a man who can sin, he has to submit himself to a Penitentiary; because he has none above him to whom he can go, he has to submit himself by himself to another—whereas he cannot, by himself, absolve himself, nor have himself absolved by another."

This solution, again, makes the restriction of confession entirely a positive law. It places the Pope in the same condition in which all Christians were, before the Church interposed to limit the use of the power of the keys. Before that, any Christian might apply to any Priest; any Priest might receive a penitent who applied to him. But the restriction being through human law, may be removed by human law, as it has been by the English Church for her children.

It must be added that, however it might be hoped that one in so sacred an office might be kept by God's grace from deadly sin, yet, with the memory of the Popes of the 10th century, of Alexander VI. or Julius II., it is no abstract question how one in such high office may be at peace with God, having been severed from Him by deadly sin.

II. The same principle applies to all Bishops and Clergy, who were allowed by the positive law to choose their own Confessor.

Aquinas refers to the positive law distinctly in this case, placing the Pope and Prelates, so far, on the same ground. He is answering the case alleged: "There are some, as the Pope and Prelates, who seem to have no priest of their own, since they have no superior." He answers, "Since ⁹ Prelates are obliged to dispense the sacraments which the clean alone ought to handle, therefore they are allowed by the law to choose those who shall be their own priests, as well as confessors, who, thus far, are superior to them; as also one physician is cured by another, not in that he is a physician, but in that he is sick."

The law then required persons to confess to "their own priest;" the law exempted Bishops from its own rule. It is not in either case a matter of inherent fitness, but of positive regulation. Pope Gregory IX. (A.D. 1232) dispensed, in these cases, with the recent rule of the Lateran Council. "Lest ¹ through the deferring of penitence, souls be perilled, we permit (Pope Gregory says) Bishops and other superiors, and lesser exempt prelates also, that even without the licence of their superior, they may choose a prudent and discreet confessor for themselves."

You will observe that the Bishop, when using confession, is not represented as inferior to him whom he chooses as his confessor, on the ground that the other has his authority from the Pope; nor indeed was that other appointed by the Pope. The Pope allowed all these not to ask licence of their superiors, but to choose a careful and discreet confessor for themselves. The Bishop becomes so far inferior, because he goes, not as a Bishop, but as a man and as a sinner, to the Priest. Whoever makes confession, confesses, not as what he is by his office, but as a sinner. As a sinner, seeking God's sentence of pardon through the power left by our Lord to His Church, he is inferior, in that act, to him from whom he receives it. He submits himself to the other. Much more may we, Priests or laymen, submit ourselves, for the time, to those to whom, as Ministers of God, we lay open the wounds of our souls.

This is an instance in which the law permits that "one may subject himself to another" who had before no jurisdiction over him. Nor even in the limited case, if the individual to whom a Bishop chose to submit himself were a priest under him, can it be said (according to the rules of the law upon which Mr. Allies is arguing), that the Bishop gave him jurisdiction over himself as a man, and then submitted himself to that jurisdiction. Even the Pope, as we saw, is not held to give that jurisdiction over himself. But Bishops are not limited to their own priests, nor is this even suggested by the Decretal. If the Bishop were to confess to another Bishop (and surely it would be nothing strange that a Bishop should use confession to another), he would be submitting himself to one to whom he could in no way give jurisdiction; and who, of himself, had none over him.

It is contended also ² that Bishops were not subject in this respect to Archbishops, nor Archbishops to Primates, nor Primates to Patriarchs, but only in the outward Court. If this be so, it would follow, that, until the theory came in, that all Bishops were under the Pope, i. e. through so many centuries, all Bishops, when they did use confession, used it with one who had no jurisdiction over them. And this is probably true, since there is no proof whatever that they ever were so subject.

It is true, that an inferior or an equal cannot give jurisdiction; but he may submit himself to it. And the very fact that he may submit himself to an equal or an inferior, shows the more that the jurisdiction necessary is possessed already. Mr. Allies says, "a person ³ cannot make himself subject to another at his own will, for this power descends from above, and does not ascend from below." But the more that principle is true, that "power descends from above," the more clear it is, that since persons are allowed by that law to subject themselves to others, whether Bishops or Priests, those Bishops and Priests had all the jurisdiction needful lodged in them already, provided that the other could lawfully submit himself. The jurisdiction in this case is said to come not from the Bishop, but from the law. Yet this is only that the law permits the Bishop to choose his confessor. "Any ⁴ Priest whatever hath from the law jurisdiction to hear the confession of any Bishop whatever, when he is selected by him to that end, as also of any inferior Prelate whatever, such as are all Superiors whatever in any order, according to Sotus (d. 18. q. 4. Art. 2)." "The Confessor of a Bishop," says de Palude ⁵, "has authority, not from him who selecteth, but from the law which permitteth." Sylvester calls this, "jurisdiction, conceded or permitted by the law ⁶," as a third class, distinct from "ordinary jurisdiction," or delegated in its narrower sense. But there is no difference in principle whatever, whether the law allow Bishops and heads of religious houses to choose their own Confessor, or whether it allow all the people. In both cases it is lawful authority, because the law gives it.

² Vazquez, qu. 93. Art. 1. dub. 2. n. 41. & Dom. Soto Dist. 18. q. 4. Art. 2. against Sylvester and Palud. d. 17. q. 3. Art. 2. concl. 2. n. 2. and (as Soto says) "most canonists."

⁶ Conf. i. 2. Hence he says, that the "proprius sacerdos" [of the Council of Lateran], taken largely, is "a lawful hearer of confessions." See also Stephanus Auffricius below, p. 95.

III. The power of choosing to whom they would confess, which was given by the law to Bishops and the superior Clergy, was, by custom, extended to all Clergy. These had also the power, not of choosing one confessor only, but one at one time, one at another.

In some countries, the rule founded on the Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215, as far as it included the Clergy, was removed by positive law.

“The Synod of Nismes, A.D. 1284, gave free liberty to Parish Priests and all Presbyters, to choose as Confessors whom they would, out of the Parish Priests and Presbyters of the same tract, especially Archdeacons, Archpresbyters, Franciscans, and Dominicans.”

“In order that Mass and other Divine Offices might be celebrated with purity of conscience,” the Council of Narbonne, A.D. 1374, (can. 18,) permitted “any Priest, as often as he needed or had opportunity, to confess his sins to any qualified Priest⁷, though not having cure of souls, and to receive the benefit of absolution from him, except in ordinary reserved cases.”

Two further concessions are cited from Spanish Councils⁸: “The Council of Tarragona, A.D. 1329, ⁷ Conc. T. xi. App. Col. 2506.

Mansi, T. 25. p. 848. A.D. 1329, has a Council of Tarragona incorporating one of A.D. 1253, in can. 28, “We, the sacred allows that any Presbyter who wishes to celebrate mass, if he have not access to his own Priest, may confess his sins to any qualified (idoneo) Presbyter, and receive the benefit of absolution."

The Council of Tarragona, A.D. 1391, extends this: "Even if his own Priest be present, as often as a Presbyter purposes to celebrate mass, we give them full liberty to confess and absolve one another of the things confessed."

But, eventually, Navarrus writes, (and all others agree with him,) that "all ⁹ Presbyters, among Christians every where, were wont to choose what other Presbyters they pleased, as Confessors." "Up to this day, we Presbyters, all and each, choose every where to which Presbyter we would confess, of whom many have no jurisdiction towards those who choose them. Nor can you say that they do this on the ground of custom, since custom avails not that any one can choose a confessor."

This arose out of custom, against the positive law. But custom was held to be only then not of avail when it was against the will of the superior. It is thus expressly limited in the decree of Boniface VIII. A.D. 1294, "It ¹ can be introduced by no custom that any one, against [præter] the allowance of his superior, may choose to himself a confessor, who can bind or loose him." "I answer," says Navarrus², "that Presbyters do this by the licence, tacit or expressed, of their superiors. For the Pope, the Bishops also, Archbishops, and their vicars, the other Prelates also, and Parish Priests, seeing all priests choosing to themselves confessors every where, to bind or loose them, and in no way withstanding, seem tacitly to will that it be done." "Custom," he continues, "can give jurisdiction, even to one who otherwise has none, as is said in the cap. 'cum contingat'³," where this conclusion is received by all. Moreover, the Pope can grant, yea, does every day grant, by his bulls which issue continually from him, to any peasant or mountaineer whatsoever, that he may choose what con-

Council approving, give to all the presbyters of our province power, that one may impart to the other the benefit of absolution, as to the sentence of excommunication."

² l. c. n. 33. Others for "præter" substituted "sine," without. The sense must still be the same, since, in fact, the practice, which the decree, so taken, says could not be brought in by custom, was brought in by custom, not by positive law, nor by express permission of Bishops. Navarrus says that the exception is virtually contained in the words themselves, or the reason of the thing. The text says it cannot be "brought in by custom that he should choose to himself a confessor without licence," "unless," Navarrus says, "the same custom, expressly or tacitly, gives to the person so chosen the actual faculty of absolving, over and above that habitual faculty which he hath from the orders he has received." He gives as a parallel instance the gloss on the words "it is against the substance of an appeal, that it should be made to an equal or inferior, (de consuetud. vi. 2.) unless," the gloss adds, "that same custom makes the judge appealed to as an equal or inferior, superior at least as to that article," according to Panormitanus (in c. fi. 2. not. de dilat.), Perusinus and Decius (in rubr. de appellat.), l. c. n. 43.

fessor he wills. This then can be brought in by custom. For there seems no principle of difference between them. For if that were against the Divine law, it would not be granted by a privilege⁴. And if it is against human law only, custom can derogate from it⁵.”

“All these,” says Sylvester⁶, [those included in the word “prælati,” in which, first by custom, all Priests with cure of souls, although not properly “prælati,” and then again by custom, all Priests, though not in any sense “prælati,” came to be included;] “according to Pet. de Palude, ‘may choose one at one time, one at another,’ which Decret. limits, ‘so that it be not for deceit.’ But Peter de Palude does not limit it; and do thou so hold; because the constitution is one of favour.” Dom. Soto, a theologian at the Council of Trent, says, as the rule of his time⁸, “they may confess to any one whomsoever of the religious, although any such religious be neither set forth by the Bishop, nor by his own prelate. His prelate can punish him, if he hears the confession of a secular priest; yet the Sacrament will hold, because the other had the power of choosing."

The Council of Trent introduced no change as to "jurisdiction," only as to qualification in the Confessor. Navarrus says "Even secular priests are not deprived of the power of choosing an approved Confessor, or one with cure of souls, although he be not his own priest" [alienus].

In 1616, Reginald¹ writes: "Through custom, Secular Priests, not those only who have cure of souls, but others also who are called simple priests, may choose what Priests they will, as confessors, whether regulars or seculars, provided those so chosen either have a parochial benefice, or being, through examination, or otherwise, judged by the Bishop to be qualified [idonei], have obtained approval." This last clause relates to the qualifications of the Priest, subsequent to the Council of Trent: it does not belong to jurisdiction. He explains the "jurisdiction" to come by the tacit consent of the Bishop. "Seeing that the Bishop, who is bound to provide as to a confessor for the said Priests, knows their custom, and is silent, there arises a tacit licence, which gives strength to the absolutions, causing them not to be void, through defect of jurisdiction; but that custom concurs only as a witness to a tacit licence²."

Suarez also says³, that custom can give jurisdiction, as it also can take it away; whence some sins are said to be 'reserved' by custom. And as one instance of this, he mentions that "Parish Priests use this faculty [of choosing confessors] without special licence of the Bishops; whence, since they have it not by law, they seem to have it by custom."

In our own country, Priests, not being directly included in the Council of Lateran, had fallen into the habit of not confessing at all. This led to the appointment of confessors for each Archdeaconry by Archbishop Langton⁴ (A.D. 1208—1228), Peccham⁵ (A.D. 1279—1292), and Reynolds⁶ (A.D. 1314—1327). The constitution of Peccham mentions the regulation as enacted before (as in the legatine constitutions of Otho⁷), but that "through the morals of the clergy, it had not hitherto been practised." The practice of priests confessing to one another seems to have continued here as elsewhere. For Lyndwode raises the question whether they can do so without the leave of the Bishop. And while he says that, by the above constitutions, they cannot, he quotes authorities⁸, that they “cannot do it without licence, general or special, tacit or expressed.” But tacit licence was the foundation of the custom, which generally prevailed elsewhere. The constitutions must have been disused; for they provide that all priests should confess to those so appointed: Lyndwode says that “priests celebrating in a parochial church, should confess to the Rector, Vicar, or his Curate, or have their leave to confess to some other.”

The same principle (Vazquez remarks) applies to the members of religious orders. “The relation of the inferiors to their Pastors, and of the Prelates to one another in their order, is by human law, through election, and yet they are subject to one another, in the court of conscience, through that law.” This custom was not interfered with, even by the Council of Trent, which forbad regulars without cure of souls, or unapproved by the Bishop, to hear the confessions of seculars. “Regulars,” whether priests or lay, were left under the same rule as before, within themselves.

By *custom*¹, again, a Cardinal was the priest of his own family; which, by custom, a Bishop was not, although he might, if he pleased, exempt his family from the jurisdiction of the Parish Priest. But the Cardinal in such wise had that privilege, that, even if he were no priest himself, he could delegate the power.

“By custom again,” Card. Panormitanus says², “the Priests of ‘hospices’ can minister the sacraments to their household, and to the poor who live in them.”

It is not matter of principle, then, but of expediency, whether the liberty given by custom to the Clergy to choose any priest they would, should be extended to the laity. If a Church may give leave to all her Priests to choose their own Confessors, so may she, if she will, to all her laity.

IV. Still wider is the case, in which licence is given to one “by his own priest” to go to another. It is allowed that this licence ought to be given very freely. Sylvester says of those rigid as to granting it, “With³ whatever end they do this, if they do it overmuch, they do ill; and when they may fear reasonably or probably, that he who asks licence, would not confess truly, if it be denied him; for evil is not to be done, that good may come. Nothing hindereth that he who in himself is a less qualified Confessor, may be more qualified, as to him who is prepared to confess to him and not to another. Whence a pastor ought to be easy in this, and ever prefer lesser ills to greater. Whence St. Thomas says, that ‘even⁴ granting that from such a Confession, made to another than a person’s own priest, some occasion of evil is given, yet it hath much the greater weight, that thereby many other greater evils are avoided, and many perils obviated," Aquinas speaks more strongly still, in answer to the objection to the limitation of confession to a person's "own priest." "In⁵ that which is necessary to salvation, men are not to be narrowed in, lest they be hindered in the way of salvation. But it seemeth a great narrowing, if one must of necessity confess to one man, and by this, many be withdrawn from confession, either through fear or shame, or some such feeling." He answers: "In this that a person ought to confess to his own priest, the way of salvation is not narrowed, but a sufficient way is laid down to salvation. But a priest would sin, if he were not easy in giving permission to confess to another, for many are so weak that they would rather die without confession than confess to a certain priest. Whence they who are too anxious to know through confession the consciences of those under them, cast around others a snare to their damnation, and consequently around themselves."

Yet this licence being given, the person might freely go to whom he pleased. Navarrus says, "Observe⁶ from those words, 'without his consent to whom he first committed himself,' that the consent of the parish priest suffices, that another priest may hear the confession of his parishioners. For nothing else is required, but his consent. Whence it follows, that he who has the faculty of choosing, may choose any priest, *even if he have not cure of souls*⁷. This is shown by the rule⁸, that whoso wishes to confess to any other than his own priest, must first seek and obtain licence from his own. It requires nothing else than a licence and faculty. It appears, too, from the custom and practice *which we see every where, and which Adrianus*⁹ says, is observed every where. For as he says, ‘by virtue of the faculty for choosing a suitable confessor, they go indifferently to any priest whatever.’” Again, “*Beyond*¹ all question, where a power of choosing a confessor has been given by the law, or by man, there seemeth to be given at the same time to him chosen, power to absolve.” And again, “The² opinion of [Card.] Panormitanus is commonly followed by all later writers, that he to whom a faculty is given for choosing a confessor, may choose for himself whom he will, whether he have cure of souls or no; and so that licence being given by the parish priest to the parishioner to choose a Confessor, is one and the same thing with power being given by the parish priest to him whom his parishioner may choose, to hear him.”

And under this head comes the very provision of the English Church. For this permission to choose a priest for himself may be given not to individuals singly, but to a whole parish. Cardinal Caietan³ says, "Licence is given in a twofold way. Expressly, when a Curate says to the people in common, 'Let every one go to confess to whom he will,' 'which is the same,' Reginaldus⁴ adds, 'as if he said, I give to every one licence to confess to whom he will.'" "This," says Caietan, "is nothing else than to give liberty to choose a confessor for himself."

In this case, the jurisdiction of a person's "own priest" is not positively transferred to the other. The parishioner is set free from the jurisdiction in which he is, and so allowed by the law to go to the other. But that other derives his authority not from any transfer, but from the law which now permits him to receive the confession. This is illustrated by the case of "a⁵ Parish Priest excommunicate, or an Incumbent (Parochus) who is not yet a priest, who can give this licence to confess to another, (according to Palud. in d. 17. q. 4.⁶) as it is given every day; and yet one, excommunicate, can transfer no jurisdiction to another (c. i. de off. Vicarii. lib. 6). And so this licence is rather the cession of a right which belongeth to him, than the committing jurisdiction ; a sort of concession, that he who is so chosen may, of his own right, hear the confession, which, before, he could not hear, on account of the division of parishes, and the prohibition of the Church. And so it is clear that any priest may by Divine right have jurisdiction, and yet be hindered from exercising it by human law."

Medina again argues⁷, "That no other jurisdiction is necessary besides the power of order and the subject matter, appears thence, that if a curate be excommunicate, he can depute a simple Priest to hear confessions, and yet an excommunicate Curate can transfuse no jurisdiction to another, as P. de Palude saith."

And again, "Every^s priest whatever has the power of order whereby he can absolve any sinner if he be lawfully placed under him ; for without matter subject to him, he will not be able to exercise the power. If prelates give to sinners the licence of choosing confessors, there is no need of any other licence for confessors, because those so licensed, in that they submit themselves to the person chosen, are made fit matter, whenever the person chosen may exercise the power of order."

Again, "The simple priest has the power of jurisdiction to him who chooseth him ; for jurisdiction in the penitential court does not add any thing above the power of order, but the subject matter, towards which the priest may exercise his power. But this he has from the voluntary subjection, by which such parishioner who hath licence to subject himself willeth to do so."

⁷ Cod. de Conf. Tr. 2. q. 34. res. 3.

"Every 'own priest,' " says Sylvester from De Palude, "who, by ordinary right can hear confessions, can commit this to another." "Every ordinary hath cure of souls through election; whence he can give leave to any one under him to confess to another."

This right, or rather duty on the part of a deacon, to give leave to one of his flock to confess to another priest, is "admitted⁹ by all;" the case of a Priest excommunicate is limited by Reginald¹ to those not publicly excommunicated.

A different sort of case is put by Almayn², in which the "jurisdiction" is apparent only. "When a cure is contested (or, others add, is obtained by simony), and he who has no right to the cure is in possession, and at last in the end it is declared that he had no right, it would follow that those who had confessed to him were bound to confess again, and that they were not absolved, because he had no jurisdiction over them. This is plain. According to the opponents, it is of Divine institution that he should confess to one who has jurisdiction in relation to him whom he absolves. Therefore he would be bound to confess the same sins. But this is not practised." Therefore, in this case, the penitent having done, as far as in him lay, what was required by the positive law of the Church, then, if this relation to his parish priest be a matter of order only, and of the discipline of the Church, the absolution, although irregular on the part of the priest who administered it, would avail to him, receiving it rightly. But if it were of Divine Institution that he should have jurisdiction over him, then the absolution would not avail when he had none. If it were said, that the Church considers him as having jurisdiction over him, until it is proved that he has none, then this is a matter of positive law, which, as being positive, the Church may alter.

Navarrus again says ³, that if any one were by the law itself deprived of his title, and possession of right, yet not so notoriously, but that in fact he retained possession and was tolerated by his superior, in that case what was done by him would be valid in the Court of Conscience.

The same sort of argument might be drawn from the times of the Anti-Popes. No true jurisdiction could be conveyed from one who had none himself.

V. The same freedom was enjoyed in those very numerous cases, in which the Pope gave permission to persons or classes of persons, sometimes to all the members of whole confraternities, to choose their own confessor. The extent of these permissions has already been mentioned by Navarrus⁴. He says in another place, “We⁵, day by day, obtain from the Roman Pontiff, privileges, that we may choose our own confessor.” “A⁶ great part of Christians have, at this day, this right of choosing confessors, (by Apostolic bulls and privileges,) the confraternity of the Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist which our Lord Pope Paul III. has lately instituted, being now formed every where.”

³ In gloss 3. n. 179-80, quoting the gloss on the c. dudum v. deceptæ, and Panormitanus, and Raven. arg. l. Barbarius ff. de Offi. præt.

There is no difference in principle, whether the privilege of choosing their own confessor be given to all, the members of a confraternity, or to a whole people. In both cases the permission is given by positive law.

VI. In the above case the Pope allowed the individual to confess to whom he would, without regarding his parish priest; in another, he allowed whole Orders to receive confessions when and of whom they saw good, without leave of the parish priest. These privileges are first read to have been given by Alexander IV. about A.D. 1260. Then, ten years afterwards, they were confirmed by his immediate successors, Urban IV. and Clement IV. Henricus Gandavensis, about A.D. 1280, wrote against this practice, and maintained that the Pope could not by these Privilegia supersede the confession to the Parish Priest. The same is held by the gloss on the Decretal, and eminent commentators, as "Archidiaconus, [Card.] Joannes Monachus, and Hostiensis [Card. Henr. de Segusio, A.D. 1262], are said to follow it⁷."

Yet even at this time the Synod of Nismes, A.D. 1284, locally, gave power to the Franciscans and Dominicans, "to hear the confessions of Clergy and laity in those towns and villages where they preach, on condition that they give the names of those whose confessions they hear, to the Parish Priests, consulting with them as to the fittest spiritual medicines for the sick by whom they are called in; lastly, that they should not attempt any thing without their consent, which the Parish Priests would always gladly give for their hearing confessions." Authority is given by the Council not to individuals, but to whole bodies, not to living individuals only, but to those unborn, who should belong to two religious Orders, to hear confessions through the whole diocese; the consent of the Parish Priest is to be asked, but as courtesy only; it is assumed that it will never be refused. If the Church can give authority to whole bodies, she may to all priests.

The recognition of the independence of these Orders was brought about through the vehement opposition of Joannes de Poliacco. He maintained that, while the Lateran Council stood, neither the Pope, nor even ⁷ Suarez, Disp. 26. s. 1. n. 9; but Hostiensis argues for the contrary, ad loc. f. 296.

God Himself could free persons from the obligation to confess to their parish priest; because, as he said, it involved a contradiction. This he was obliged to recant, and the whole statement was condemned by John XXII.¹: A.D. 1320. "It is now unlawful," says D. Soto², "to question it." It was thus established that the consent of the Parish Priest was not required for a parishioner who wished to make his confession to one of these Orders. The same privilege which was first given to the Dominicans and Franciscans was afterwards given to all the Mendicant Orders, to the Augustinians by Clement V., and the Carmelites by John XXII.³ This affects the statement of "jurisdiction" in this way, that a person is, so far, no longer placed under a person having jurisdiction over him. A person who may choose one of two independent, and, as was often the case, rival authorities, is not, in the same strict sense, under either. The one had no jurisdiction over him; the other had, so far, only a limited and conditional jurisdiction, if he willed not to go to the other. Both had the authority, "jus dicendi," but to him only as he willed to submit himself to the one or the other.

The jurisdiction of the Parish Priest was then held to be entirely superseded by the authority of the Pope. The relation of these Orders to the Bishop varied. At first, they acted solely under the authority of the Pope, without any reference to the Bishop. Boniface VIII. (A.D. 1300) restricted the Orders⁴, required those who heard confessions to be presented to the Bishop, receive his licence, and then to hear confessions, not in whole provinces as before, but in the diocese and cities to which they were appointed. The Bishops might refuse individuals, not all the members of the Order. This was decreed "on account of the grave and perilous discord of old prevailing" between the seculars and regulars. This decree was rescinded by Benedict XI. four years after, A.D. 1304, on account, as he says⁵, of the increased discord, and that "seven hydra's heads arose for one cut off." He gave them free leave to hear confessions, annulled any excommunications passed against it, or to impair it, forbade those who so confessed to be required to confess again to their own priest, and required any one's simple word that he had so confessed, to be taken by the parish priest Clement V., seven years after (in Council. Vienn. A.D. 1311) repealed⁶ the decree of Benedict, and restored that of Boniface.

After this, Priests belonging to religious orders had to be presented to the Bishop, in order to hear confessions in his diocese; "saving," Gregory de Valentia says⁷, “all peculiar privileges which religious of various orders may have as to this.”

The Bishop is allowed, even on the principle of the later Roman Church (although subordinate to the Pope), to have the same power relatively to his diocese⁸. He may appoint any other to hear confessions without or against the will of the Parish Priest.

VII. Again, as Mr. Allies himself states, in articulo mortis, (or rather, more generally, “in probable, though uncertain, peril of death,”) it is always allowed to persons to confess to any one.

This allowance has been commonly understood to be of the broadest kind, when danger is imminent. And so, under this rule, (according to most authorities in the Roman Church,) are included cases where is commonly peril of death⁹, as in a war, or a stormy sea, or sailing when the sea is wont to be stormy, or a long voyage, or through places beset or perilous, or in approaching child-birth, or dangerous sickness, as an acute fever; “if¹ he is sick unto death, or ought to enter a just war or the sea;” “whencesoever² it is feared that death may result, whether war, or the sea, pestilence, or sickness." Again, the liberty to confess (in the absence of his own priest) to "any Priest," is as large as possible. In cases, not of proximate danger, (as the voyage,) a person is allowed to confess to a Priest "neither approved by the Bishop, nor having jurisdiction;" in the case of peril of death, any priest, whether suspended, or excommunicate by name, or degraded³, or schismatic, or (as it is said by the most part) even a heretic, might hear confession and absolve from all sins, including all reserved cases and censures. And this so far, that if the sick should recover, he would be wholly free from all censures; and the obligation to confess once in the year would be so fulfilled. The penitent is obliged to prefer any qualified priest to one excommunicate or heretical, else he would be indifferent to excommunication or heresy; but in the absence of such, he is even held bound to confess to a heretic, if there be no danger of his being corrupted by his heresy⁴. If a simple Priest had begun to hear the confession, when the Bishop or Parish Priest came in, he might continue, even against the objection of the Parish Priest. Even "in a case not of extreme necessity," a person might, against the refusal both of the Bishop and of the Parish Priest, if there be any urgent cause (as not to discover accomplices or bring harm), confess to any simple Catholic priest not publicly excommunicated, and be by him absolved from all sins, including, indirectly, reserved cases and excommunications.

This again shows that the former restriction is by the law of the Church. The case was not provided for by any canon, before the Council of Trent. That Council itself appealed simply to the custom of the Church⁵. "Although⁶ it may be inferred from many laws, it is older than all written canon law." By tacit consent, the Church, when limiting confession, dispensed, in this case, with her own laws. The jurisdiction is not given positively to any priest. There is no fresh act bestowing the jurisdiction. It is a rule of the instinctive charity of the Church. When she restricted the other exercise of the power of the keys, she, tacitly, by the common feeling of all her Episcopate, left, in this case, the authority, which Christ has committed to Priests, wholly unrestricted.

But, again, as by the tacit permission of the Church, all Priests have authority to receive confessions from the dying, and the absence of a special jurisdiction is no hindrance, so neither, if the Church so permits, is it in the case of penitents, though not dying.

VIII. The Emperor and Empress, "*from*⁷ most ancient custom, confess to their own chaplains." The custom is not known to have had any origin. Suarez says, "Kings⁸ and princes, especially sovereigns, are wont to be excepted; of whom we can lay down nothing, because they are not exempt by the law itself, by reason of their dignity or power. In this, the privileges of this sort allowed to princes are to be retained, and ancient customs which are to be believed to have been introduced lawfully and with consent of superiors." It is probably inherited from ancient times, when all had free choice. Kings were left unrestricted. When the case came to be explained on the principle of jurisdiction, it was accounted for by the tacit concurrence of the Pope. "The Pope's overlooking," it is added, "is equivalent to licensing it⁹." In like way, says Sylvester, "any other 'own priest' gives licence by interpretation, i. e. if he overlook it" [dissimulando]. The privilege which the Emperor had by custom, was extended by positive permission from the Pope to grandees generally. Dom. Soto says, "The Bishop of the city where they are anointed and crowned, is said to be their 'own priest.' But now, not kings only, but all grandees abound in diplomas from the Pontiff, to choose, as confessor, whom they will."

The office of Confessor of the King and Queen in England, was, I have understood, only abolished at a somewhat recent date.

IX. There is another, the very opposite class, which was provided for in the same way, the homeless, the wanderers, those who had no certain dwelling-place¹⁰. These are, among us, accounted as part of the cure of him, in whose district they, for the time, are. But they are not, in any technical sense, under his jurisdiction. According to the rules of the later Western Church, they were obliged to confess their sins once in the year, but once only. Until then, or unless they were domiciliated for a year, (or at the time of Easter, if they had not confessed before,) they were under no jurisdiction. But they might have sins, since they left their home, which they might wish to confess. These, then, by the common, unwritten law of the Church, were allowed to go to whom they would; for they withdrew themselves from none. They are as the wounded by the way-side. Priests and Levites could not, under the Gospel, pass by on the other side. Yet, under this class, are included also others, not in that sense "vagabundi," though with no fixed abode. Such are the agents of proprietors, or others, whose employment allows them no fixed residence; bailiffs; travelling merchants; labourers, who work in different places for a short time, as in digging; soldiers; any who are looking out for a domicile, leaving their own, whether "travelling by land or by water;" and scholars, who are settled for less than a year. These are all included by one tacit law of charity. But they illustrate the rule of the Council of Lateran, and bear out our own. For, not being included under that rule, as having no "Priest of their own," they come "under the ancient law and confess to whom they will."

In former times, those who left their parishes were obliged to have leave from their parish priest to travel. "This¹ leave carried with it the other leave of confessing to another, if need were. Now, that custom being disused, they are supposed to have the tacit consent of their parish priest." Suarez² adds, "that it must be done in good faith. For if any were to travel, only that he might have an occasion of confessing to another, and of escaping the censure of his own priest who wished to cut off occasions of sin, this would no longer be a necessity, but mere will, in conformity neither with the intention of the Pastor, nor with the practice of the Church. And so, such confession would be to be accounted invalid, through defect of jurisdiction."

This again illustrates how the principle of these rules is to prevent withdrawing from lawful jurisdiction, or dishonest confessions. The same act is valid, or invalid, according to the intention.

As to "soldiers," Suarez says, that Navarrus is over-scrupulous in limiting it to cases in which "they cannot easily have recourse to their own priests, because there is no law providing that a jurisdiction should be gained, solely through lengthened dwelling." Suarez rejoins, "neither is there any 'law,' in the case that their own pastor were of difficult access. But if it be said, as it must be, that this could be rightly introduced by custom, and is clear, the same may be said simply and absolutely without any limitation, because, as Navarrus himself confesses, morally speaking, such access is never easy, and therefore that custom was introduced which has the force of an universal law."

Yet, under this head also, the varying statements show the uncertainty as to the theory of jurisdiction. Thus, as to ordinary travellers, Suarez says that grave authors think that, strictly speaking, they lost their privilege of confessing to another priest, when the custom was left off of giving licence on setting out upon their journey. Suarez himself thinks that, considering the custom and tacit consent of Parish Priests, it is probable and true that such may confess to the Parish Priest where they are, or to Priests having delegated jurisdiction there from the Bishop. Victor thought that "they ought to confess in the Cathedral Church;" but, as Suarez says, "without ground."

X. Another class of cases is, when there is adequate ground to think that a person's own priest is as satisfied that another should receive the confession of his parishioner, as that he should receive it himself. This is called ex rati habitione de præsenti. It is justified by the analogy of the ordination of priests by another Bishop, without leave of the Bishop to whose Diocese they belonged. The act of S. Epiphanius in ordaining Clerks out of the diocese of St. Chrysostom is alleged in favour of the reception of such clerks³. Sylvester says, "this⁴ ground is true, if referred to the present, as when, from conjecture, he reasonably supposes, that his own priest is content." Greg. de Valentia instances⁵, "if he knew that one placed under him wishes to confess to another, and is silent, and gives no indication whatever that it displeases him." This is a mere acquiescence (and it may be a tacit one) in the act of the other Priest, and illustrates how the principle in question is that of non-interference with the province of another. This should, according to Lyndwode, be "in the absence of him who has the cure." Accordingly, in a sudden emergency, one who acted with the moral certainty that the Parish Priest would be satisfied with his act, had jurisdiction enough.

⁴ Conf. i. 6.

The principle as to royal personages (above, n. 8.), is applied to the case of any "one priest" who "gives leave interpretatively, i. e. by overlooking."

I have mentioned only the ex rati habitione de præsenti, because most writers say that the hope that the lawful priest will sanction the act of going to another is inadequate. And this, because the act must at the time have been valid, or invalid; and if invalid at the time, could not be made valid by an after act. There is, however, another view, that absolutions given bonâ fide, though irregularly, were valid in themselves, unless they were subsequently invalidated. A remarkable instance occurs in St. Cyprian's time, already alluded to, in which a Bishop was admonished, and a Priest excommunicated, for restoring to communion one of the lapsed against the decree of the Council. Even the Bishop had no authority in this case against the higher authority of the Provincial Council. Yet the Council decreed: "We⁶ thought good, howsoever, that the peace given by a Priest of God was not to be taken away, and have therefore allowed Victor to use the communion granted him." Thomassin speaks broadly as to later times. Speaking of the Council of Paris (A.D. 829), which forbade the regulars to receive the confessions of the seculars in their convents, he says, "From this⁷, those lasting quarrels subsequently, between the Bishops or Parish Priests and the Monks, had their rise. But there is no room for doubting that the Bishops could decree the absolutions of the Monks and the confessions made to them, to be invalid (invalidas decernere), since we have just declared that the Bishops were armed with the same power towards all Presbyters; i.e. to mark out what lines they willed, or rather what should be the practice of the Church, beyond which any thing they essayed should be null."

They had the power of making null what, if they did not make it null, was valid.

The "Prêtre Sanctifié" (a standard work on confession⁸), certainly implies that not in death only, but in life, persons went to other confessors, without the consent expressed or implied of their own, and yet that the confessions were not ipso facto invalid. For the writer gives earnestly the advice that priests should leave their penitents free to confess to whom they will, even when this is done without asking leave of themselves. "If your penitents are sick, you must then abstain from going to them, unless you know that the sick man himself wishes for you, and not his relations. Indeed, it may happen that some one of those whom you believe to have most entire confidence in you, may wish, under this circumstance, to apply to another. On so important an occasion, it is your duty to leave him wholly free; but if he asks you, give him all possible help. If even you perceive or suspect that, without being sick, your penitents confess sometimes to others, beware of asking them about it, and still more of expressing displeasure at it; it would be the way to lose their confidence. Not to leave them free to confess to whom they will, would be to wound them on the most tender and important point, viz., their spiritual comfort.”

After the Council of Trent, a case occurred involving all the Roman Catholics in this country. In the absence of Bishops, the regulars had received the confessions of the laity, without the approbation of the Bishop, which the Council of Trent required. This belonged, so far, to “jurisdiction,” in that, after the Council of Trent, this qualification was required as an antecedent condition of jurisdiction. The confessions, however, had been heard, bonâ fide, since there was no Roman Catholic Bishop in England, by whom the regulars could be approved. The titular Bishop of Chalcedon, when appointed, made the acts valid.

The account is thus given by Dod:—

8th Obj.—“The⁹ charge runs high against the regulars, if, for want of episcopal approbation, their absolutions were invalid from 1623 till 1655; and even till 1688, if it be insisted, that the chapters’ approbation of their faculties was as necessary as that of the Bishop of Chalcedon."

Ans.—"The circumstance of bonâ fide alleviates the weight of this charge; and it was still more diminished by the Bishop of Chalcedon's prudential concession. For when he perceived that the regulars were violently bent upon maintaining their pretended exemptions, he published an authentic approbation of their faculties pendente lite, by which means both they and the laity who made use of them as confessors, were secured from their scruples; and the chapter never recalling the said approbation, there was no more questioning the validity of their absolution."

XI. All who have any experience in confession, know that the minds of many are as much disquieted by those slighter sins, which are called "venial¹⁰," as others are by those called "deadly"¹ sins. They will frequently be a subject of confession; and are a legitimate subject of confession among us also, for the Church in her exhortation, invites all who cannot quiet their conscience. They will often be, as the soul grows in grace, the only sins to be confessed. Yet the soul grows in grace through their confession. The power of the keys is exercised as to these also; and God does give grace on its use. Now, for the confession of these, it is acknowledged by all the Roman writers, that no jurisdiction is required, other than is possessed by every priest; that any simple priest may, without any other authority than that which he received through his ordination, absolve from these sins.

The question then arises among the Roman writers, "on what principle is this freedom to confess venial sins to any priest whatsoever, to be reconciled with the theory of jurisdiction?" "In what way, or from what authority, have all priests jurisdiction as to these; from Christ, or from the Church?"

The Church has never, at any time, expressed any opinion one way or the other on the subject; she has not, in the remotest way, noticed venial sins. She has not given any authority to any priests, nor made any distinction by which these cases are exempt from the law as to other sin. Navarrus says, "I² see no where any authority whereby it may be proved that he who has only venial sins, may confess to any confessor he wills; but if, as many affirm, this is received, I grant it." It is, indeed, allowed by every writer to be universally admitted. The only question is, "Whence or what is the jurisdiction, or is there any?"

This is a case of real difficulty as to the view of jurisdiction (as appears from the many explanations given of it), and it may help to clear up what is meant by jurisdiction. Medina³ raises the question, whether there is any difference between these and other sins; whether all must not be confessed to a priest having jurisdiction. He argues on the current principles, that all confession of sin implies an act of judging; that therefore there must be jurisdiction; that a simple priest has none by any human law (for it is pre-supposed that he is neither the parish priest, nor commissioned by him); and if it were said that he had it by the Divine law, as from St. John xx. 23, "Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them," much more must it then be allowed that every priest has, by that same Divine law, jurisdiction as to deadly sins, since our Lord makes no distinction, but rather speaks of these, in that He adds, "Whose sins ye retain, they are retained."

³ De Confess. qu. 36.

Medina supposes the permission to be given by the Council of Lateran; for that the obligation therein imposed, to confess once a year, relates only to deadly sins; the rule then of the same Council, that the confession should be to a person's "own priest," relates to these only; the others, then, are left free. But this presupposes that all priests have the jurisdiction necessary, when the Church does not restrain it. For not to restrain is not to give, but to leave what a person had before.

The explanation, however, on his principles, as well as on those of Navarrus, is that given by Navarrus, that all priests have, by virtue of their order, the necessary jurisdiction; that nothing further is required than that a person have leave to submit himself, and that "it is to be supposed that those who have venial sins only, have this leave tacitly, either from the law or from the law-giver."

Navarrus supposes "that⁴ the jurisdiction was never taken away from Presbyters," because learning or wisdom was not required for it in this case. He thinks that the object of the rule of Urban being, to secure qualified confessors, or such as were acquainted with the individual's soul, it is not to be extended to this case.

On the other hand, D. Soto⁵ held that there was no jurisdiction at all, taking "jurisdiction" in his sense ; because none are compelled to confess venial sins ; “but there is no jurisdiction where there is no power of compelling.” Aquinas had said before him, “the⁶ remission of venial sins requires the power of order alone.”

⁴ 1. c. n. 23.

Caietan takes the same ground. “No⁷ one is bound to confess venial sins, and so no one is, by the law, placed under any confessor for these ; and therefore any one may be sacramentally absolved by any priest from venial sins.” But still he holds that there is what may be brought under the idea of jurisdiction (reductive), as in the case of the Pope, through the voluntary submission of the individual.

Melchior Canus⁸ says, that it is the common opinion that all priests receive in ordination, jurisdiction as to venial sins.

Capreolus rests the difference entirely on the withdrawal from lawful authority. According to that view, which supposed all spiritual authority to be derived from the Pope, he says⁹, “a person is committed to Peter in all things in which he needs to be loosed by another ; in these things, therefore, he cannot subject himself to another. But from venial sin a man may loose himself by himself without Peter, or any other priest ; in like way as to deadly sin of which he has once been absolved, unless an ordinance of the Church be opposed; any priest may absolve any one who willet to confess to him, from any venial sin, or any deadly sin of which he has already been absolved, because as to these, he is bound to no one."

Suarez¹ objects to Soto the declaration of Pope Eugenius IV., which affirms the necessity of jurisdiction, and yet does not limit it to deadly sin. He argues further, that in all confession, the priest must be in some way a judge, and that he must have the power of absolving or no, according to the state of mind of the person confessing. To Caietan he objects, that in no case, jurisdiction can be simply given by the submission of another, without any gift from above. To those who held this jurisdiction to be of Divine right, he objects that the universal Church can and does deprive priests of it, when excommunicated², or degraded; that it is not founded on St. John xx. (on the ground above-named); that if it be not proved by this, there is no proof of any special gift as to these sins, by Christ; that although their confession is voluntary, yet that, if made, it must be made to one having jurisdiction, in like way as it must be made to a priest, not a layman; that, therefore, there must be some jurisdiction. In this case, the following principles are admitted: 1. that, if it is free to a person to confess or no, it is free to him to confess to whom he will; 2. that where the law does not require him to confess to a particular priest, he is free to choose any priest; 3. that jurisdiction may exist, where it is given by no law or act of the Church, apart from that of Ordination itself; 4. that the tacit consent of the Church gives it, or continues it. He himself holds that it is given or delegated by tacit consent of the Pope; Gregory de Valentia, that "all³ priests have it from the Church herself by force of custom." But Vazquez⁴ holds, that although a priest, forbidden to use this authority, would sin in exercising it, the absolution would be valid, and agrees with those who hold that the jurisdiction is given by Divine right, since the Church cannot reserve any such sins, nor prohibit any one from receiving absolution from them.

XII. The case of the "ignorance of the priest" is again provided for by a law, bearing the title of Pope Urban II., A.D. 1067; which most authorities hold not to be superseded by the Council of Lateran. Indeed, those who held that the older is modified by the later law, still, for the most part, inconsistently held that a person, according to the Council of Lateran, must "ask," but need not "obtain" leave to confess to another priest in case of the ignorance of him "to whom he had committed himself," or (as it was afterwards commonly understood,) of his parish priest, since the Canon of Urban II. leaves this case free. This plainly cannot be reconciled with the meaning of the Council, which says, "leave being asked and obtained." The solution therefore seems best, that the Council of Lateran left this case as it was⁵.

Medina says⁶, that in this case the person has the power of choosing, not simply because "he has a just cause of refusing the ignorant priest, but because the law supplies the defect or leave of his own Curate."

Gregory de Valentia says, "If⁷ a priest, to whose care any one be otherwise committed, be plainly ignorant, then any other priest can by law receive the confession of him who was committed to that ignorant priest. So Pope Urban appointed (de Pœn. d. 6. c. ult.), as John Medina (de Conf. q. 30, 31.) and others commonly observe; and they understand it absolutely and generally, although that ignorant priest be a person's own Parish Priest, as the Gloss explains."

And Vazquez, "In⁸ other cases, licence is not given by law [jure], and we presuppose that there is no other licence. Therefore, in these it is not lawful to choose a Confessor indifferently. But, in the case of 'ignorance,' it is expressly conceded to any one (de Pœn. dist. 6. c. ult.). For Canus, who says that we must abide by the decision of the Council of Lateran, as though it derogated from that chapter which seemed plainly to allow a person to choose another priest, on account of ignorance in his own, is plainly mistaken." Vazquez, however, himself supposes that the ignorance must be so great, "that for want of knowledge, a confession made with him would be null:" and (2.) that a person, not having jurisdiction as yet by commission, might be chosen, if none of those could be had, who had it, such as the privileged confessors.

⁵ Suarez adopts this principle. "Canus, rel. p. 5, admits that a special privilege is here given by human law, but adds that it was revoked by the c. omnis. But not rightly;—for the c. omnis does not recall any licences, if such there were, granted by human law."

Suarez, although he limits the decree (I think) unnaturally, says, "many⁹ understand that the faculty of choosing a confessor is given by a special law to each of the faithful, if his own priest be ignorant."

The law itself may more conveniently be considered by itself¹⁰. It is enough here to notice the admitted principle, that if any one on this ground was free, not to go to him under whom he had placed himself, he was free to go to whom he would.

And it is the more plain, that no restriction not expressed in the rule is to be introduced in it, because it is itself a restriction on liberty, which existed before. Had, then, any further restriction been intended, it also would have been mentioned.

On these grounds, it became necessary for Roman divines to explain and extend the brief statement of Pope Eugenius IV., which Mr. Allies quotes; that the minister absolving “is a priest, having authority of absolving, either ordinary, or by commission of a superior.” Cardinal Caietan¹ observes, that, besides the two obvious modes on the part of the authority lodged beforehand in the Absolver, either by ordinary office, as the Episcopate or Parish, or by commission, as from the Pope, or Bishops, or Curates, or their officials or vicars,—there are five other modes or cases, by which a Priest has one placed under him, so that he can sacramentally absolve him from his sins. Reginald² adopts his five cases, but prefixes to them one, which Caietan classes as more directly delegated. His division seems to be the best. A Parish Priest directly delegates his authority, if he gives it to a Priest occupying his place at a Festival, or to a Curate, or allows such Curate or Priest to associate another with him; and in the case of a Curate, this might in some sense be said to be delegation by a Superior. But, although, as stated above, it was held to convey the same "jurisdiction," it is not, in any sense, delegation by a superior to the other priest, when free leave only is given to the penitent to confess to another. The cases, then, as arranged by Reginald, are :

I. "Commission" corresponds with case iv. above; and is the only case in which the jurisdiction over the individual is in any sense delegated by the person ordinarily possessing it. Yet, even in this, it is not delegated directly to the individual who receives the confession; but it is a simple licence to the person confessing, to go to whom he will. "The consent of the Priest," Suarez says³, "need not be given in any formal way. It may be given under any words, signs, or writing."

II. "Necessity" is the above case vii. This, it is held, the Church could not rescind; the power of absolving being given, according to some, by the Divine law, according to others, by the law of the Church; yet the Church could not prohibit it, because such an act would be "irrational⁴," and "an intolerable error⁵."

III. "Liberty" is "that⁶ whereby a man is in such condition as not to be subjected to any particular person as his own priest."

This comprehends, according to them, case i., the Pope, as being subject to none: case ix. those who

³ Disp. 26. s. 1. n. 13.

⁴ Reg. n. 60.

⁵ Suarez. Disp. 26. s. 4.

never remain in the same place, so that they are not under one more than another; and xi. those who have venial faults only.

IV. "Faculty" is a power given by the law to choose a confessor. This is twofold, according as the law (1.) allows individuals or classes to choose for themselves, as in the case of the higher clergy (case ii.); or, (2.) appoints additional persons or classes of persons, whom all may choose (case vi.). I suppose that permission given by the Pope to whole classes of persons to choose their confessor (case v.) comes under this head; as also the case of the "ignorance" of the confessor (case xii.).

V. "Licence" is either tacit, (case x. or travellers, case ix.) or express. Express is either by giving permission to exercise cure of souls, as to a Curate, or to administer Sacraments.

VI. "Custom" comprehends the cases of the ordinary Clergy (case iii.), or Royal personages (case viii.), those who have no fixed abode (part of ix.). Custom, it was ruled, could not prevail against the will of the Superior. It was interpreted then to be "a witness to the tacit permission of the ordinary authority," and it was held that if this tacit permission was conceded by the higher authority, it "could not be revoked by the lower." "Custom," then, was construed as (case v.) "tacit licence."

The case then is quite clear as to jurisdiction. In whatever way any one might lawfully (legitimè) submit himself to another priest, that priest had "jurisdiction" with regard to him. The only thing or-bidden was to act against authority. If the Bishops allowed a custom to spring up, it was valid, even against law, as in the case of priests confessing to one another. It was quite natural, (for it was a law of regenerate nature, a fruit of the love of the Church, adapting itself to different circumstances,) it was quite natural, but very opposed to a stiff theory of jurisdiction, that these exceptions were allowed to continue, or tacitly grow up through custom. It was an unwritten law, deeper than all human law, the law of love written in the heart, which controlled the written law. Kings find it hard to humble themselves. They were allowed to humble themselves before whom they would; they might choose their own confessors, rather than be exposed to neglect it altogether. Priests "blushed" to confess to their own prelate;" other means were provided, or they were allowed to confess to one another, notwithstanding contingent evil⁸; travellers became dis-used to ask leave of their priest before they left home; it was construed into a tacit consent of their priest, and they were allowed to confess as they needed. In the hour of death, the Church was anxious that there should be no hindrance to the relief of a burthened conscience, and so, if the Parish Priest or even the Bishop were by, the penitent might choose in preference any simple priest.

⁸ "It is not very expedient, lest those conscious of the same crimes should defer to one another. For (C. 16. q. 2. c. 1) 'it is the manner of men to reverence him by whose judgment or will they are raised up or put down;' and so penitence would come to be weakened, and grace be through carnal favour." Host. de pœn. et rem. c. cui sit conf. sac. § cui presbyter paroch.

It would then have been a sufficient answer, that (as I hope to show presently) "custom" allows confession among us to be made to whom we would. Even had the words "or some other" been originally restricted to any class of priests, custom, growing out of the tacit consent of Bishops, not now only, but in other centuries since the Reformation, would have been a sufficient justification. But, according to the law before the Reformation, any one in whose presence the Priest should say, "let any of my parishioners confess to whom he will," "let him come to me or some other," would have been entitled to go to any priest, whether such priest had cure of souls or no. Now, besides the leave of the particular priest, they have that of the law itself, which is acknowledged to supersede that of the individual priest. The words which the Church directs a priest to use, are more solemn than if he said them of his own mind. But, if said of his own mind, they would, according to the principles then admitted in the Roman Church, convey authority to any simple priest to receive those confessions; much more when they have the authority of the law also.

This then might, in itself, remove the anxiety which Mr. Allies' statements have raised. Priests had, before the Reformation, the right of confessing to whom they would; students at Universities were under no proprius sacerdos; all who had leave from their own Parish Priest, whether given individually or generally, might choose their own confessor. Parochial Priests might receive confessions out of their own Diocese, when any had leave by law or custom, or tacit permission, to come to them.

One question only remains, although not raised in this letter, and that relates not to "jurisdiction," but to "qualification." Admitting that it is lawful that any Priest with cure of souls may receive the confessions of those who have leave to come to him, the question might be raised, whether one without cure of souls was qualified, without a licence from the Bishop. This question is almost personal to myself. For most others who have exercised this office have, I believe, had cure of souls. And the question is not whether this ministry may be exercised by those who have cure of souls, towards souls not under their cure. This has been proved. But it is, whether those without cure of souls, may exercise it at all. It would hardly be worth dwelling upon, but that some of those who have gone from us, seem to have been at pains to speak against my acts as irregular, in order to diminish any influence which God may have permitted me to have. I will mention then in limine, that they who insist upon the necessity of a licence for those without cure of souls, admit that graduates in Theology, though not having cure of souls, might, according to the custom antecedent to the Council of Trent, receive confessions without licence from the Bishop.

The question arose out of the privileges given to some of the Monastic Orders, and the subsequent contests between them and the secular Clergy. The doubt was founded in part upon some misapplied statements of Gratian in the Decretals, partly on supposed inconveniences, if the selection of a priest were left indiscriminately to any one who obtained the leave, however unfit he might be to judge.

As to the passages in Gratian, they relate only to the ordinary exercise of the pastoral functions by the Monks, as Hostiensis and Medina explain them. Hostiensis⁹ says, “What is said by Goffridus and Raymundus, who do not agree that the religious should hear confessions, is no hindrance. For the laws which they allege, are to be understood of religious who wish to usurp parishes without licence of their superior, as the laws themselves imply; or when they wish to hear any one without licence of the judge of the sinner, or when they do this without licence of the Abbot, and under no pressure of necessity, as is implied in 66. q. 1. c. 8, sqq.”

The two statements of Gratian are, (1.) “that¹ although Monks, when they receive the presbyterate, ⁹ De poen. et rem. v. cui confit. sit sac. f. 296. Medina, l. c. q. 34. ad 2. Adrian in iv. de sacr. Conf. f. 85.

receive the same priestly powers as others, and may have ecclesiastical benefices, yet they have not the executing of that power, unless they be chosen by the people, and appointed by the Bishop with consent of the Abbot." (2.) "It² has been shown sufficiently that to Monks, who have received the honour of the presbyterate, been elected by the people, and instituted by the Bishop, the same is allowed as to other priests." Both clearly relate to benefices, which they could not enter upon, unless elected and instituted; but could if they were. And the ground alleged is, that all receive ordination in the same way. Gratian adds at the close, "Without the licence of Bishops, not only monks, but all Clergy generally, are forbidden to use their powers." But this, as well as the preceding, has reference to every function of the whole clerical office. It would prove too much. The decretal of Pseudo-Isidore, which Gratian quotes³ in support of this statement, does not allude to this subject at all, and extends to laity as well as Clergy. "All the faithful, and especially all presbyters and deacons, and the rest of the Clergy, must take heed that they do nothing, without the licence of their own Bishop; let not any one of the presbyters, without his command, celebrate masses in his own parish, nor baptize, nor do any thing without his permission." But in these times, before the change introduced by the Council of Trent, it was held generally, that no further licence was required for hearing confessions, beyond the licence or leave given to any penitent by any one having authority to give that licence, whether the Pope, or the Bishop, or the Parish Priest.

I would first observe, that this question is quite distinct from that of jurisdiction; it relates to qualification only. Even subsequently to the Council of Trent, Suarez distinguishes clearly between a Bishop's approving, and giving jurisdiction. The Council of Trent required that none should have jurisdiction who was not approved by the Bishop. The approval, thenceforth, became essential to a person's having jurisdiction, but even then, it did not convey jurisdiction. It was a restriction on jurisdiction as previously possessed. "The Church," says Suarez⁴, "can prescribe the mode of communicating jurisdiction, and lay down any condition, without which, such a person should be incapable of receiving jurisdiction; or, which is the same, without which, the conferring of jurisdiction should be void and of no value. For this is a sort of contract or human action, having a moral effect as to another, which may be made null, unless it take place with the due conditions."

In the case of the Monastic orders, the jurisdiction still came from the Pope, the approval, from the Bishop. The jurisdiction existed, but could no longer be used without the approbation of the ⁴ Disp. 28. s. 4. quis sit idoneus min. ex Conc. Trid. n. 14.

Bishop, for the Council of Trent forbade this. The approval was essential to the use of the jurisdiction, but did not convey it. Priests may now be approved, and yet not receive jurisdiction; Henriquez says, "The⁵ Bishop is wont to approve Priests in various ways. Some secular priests he approves, as qualified to be chosen by others, yet gives them no jurisdiction which may suffice without the delegation of the Parish Priest, &c."

Suarez says, "The⁶ Bishop himself may approve, and not delegate jurisdiction. For the concession of jurisdiction is a sort of favour, which a Bishop gives freely; but this approbation is, as it were, an act of justice, i. e. a just judgment, whereby one is declared qualified. Whence the Bishop rightly may declare this juridically, and approve, and yet not delegate his jurisdiction to one so approved. He may also simply approve, and yet give jurisdiction only for a time, or during his own life; and then, although the jurisdiction would cease through the death of the Bishop, the approbation would not. Wherefore this approbation seemeth to be nothing else than a sort of public sentence, or authentic declaration of the sufficiency of such a Priest to hear confessions, which the Council of Trent willed should be a sort of necessary disposition, that a simple Priest should be proximately capable of jurisdiction, or be eligible through privileges." Reginald uses the same topics.

But, further, as to the question of licence or approbation itself, Suarez treats the question at length, and distinguishes between the older law before the Council of Trent, and that enacted by that Council. Having quoted several older authorities, he says⁷:—

"I say first, the Parish Priest, before the Council of Trent, by the force of the common law, could both validly and lawfully commit his jurisdiction to any other Priest who, according to the natural or Divine law, was qualified to administer the sacrament, [i. e. as Suarez explains, 'one not specially suspended or prohibited by the Bishop:'] although he had no other jurisdiction or approbation of the Bishop. This is proved, because there was power in the party delegating; for this belongs to him by the force of ordinary jurisdiction; and this (as we presuppose) was not tied or hindered: because on the part of the Parish Priest himself, there was no positive law prohibiting that delegation, nay, nor is now, as we shall see below. Again, on the other side, there was capacity in the Priest, and there was no law specially requiring in him either of the said conditions [jurisdiction or Episcopal approbation], because it cannot be shown in any canon or papal decree, nor does it follow from the nature of the thing. For to him to whom the sheep were committed as their ordinary pastor, could be committed also the care of taking a worthy and sufficient coadjutor, and therefore since it was not prohibited, it was supposed to be given.

“Secondly, standing upon the ancient law, by a general faculty given to choose a confessor, any Priest might be chosen, qualified by the Divine law, without any other condition, or approbation being required by human law. This is proved on the same ground, that no law can be pointed out, wherein this is prescribed.

“Whence I infer farther, although the faculty was given in these general words, ‘a fitting and qualified [idoneo] Priest,’ it would not be to be limited or interpreted necessarily of ‘a Priest’ declared by public authority to be ‘qualified,’ by either of the said ways. For this declaration or limitation too is not contained in the law, nor is it necessary by the force of reason alone, because it may be ascertained sufficiently in other ways that the Priest is qualified, as by experience, or public report, or knowledge, or the testimony of other credible persons. And although it is true that from a general permission so understood, and given to any one of the people, inconvenience might arise, it only follows thence that it belonged to the care of the pastors of the Church, not to grant it without greater definiteness or circumspection.”

This, he says, was done by the Council of Trent; and further, that it appears from the very words of the Council, that the law so enacted was new. “It is certain," he says, "after the decree of the Council of Trent, (Sess. 23. c. 15. de ref.) that it doth not suffice that the person of the Priest, to whom jurisdiction is to be delegated in this Court, should have all things required by Divine or natural law to perform this ministry, except he has the special approbation of the Church as to this, decreed by that new law." This was, "The Holy Synod decrees that none even of the regulars can hear the confessions of the seculars, even Priests, nor be considered qualified for this, unless, by a parochial benefice, or by the Bishop through examination, (if it shall seem to them to be necessary,) or otherwise, he be judged to be qualified, and obtain the approbation, which is to be given gratis, all privileges and customs whatsoever, even immemorial, notwithstanding."

This decree seems principally to have reference to the long-established custom of the monastic orders. The Council itself bears witness, that there had been "privileges and customs immemorial," allowing the "regulars" to hear the confessions of any, without previous approbation by the Bishop.

But Suarez notes that the limitation introduced is new. "That one of these modes [i. e. either parochial cure, or direct approbation by the Bishop] should be necessary, is new, and introduced by the Council, as appears by what has been said above, and is indicated in the words of the Council, 'The Holy Synod decrees.'"

From this it appears, (1.) that in Suarez' judgment, one who had leave to choose to whom to unburden his conscience, might, before the Council of Trent, choose one without cure of souls, and without any approbation of the Bishop; (2.) that whatever inconvenience may occasionally arise if an undiscerning person should mistake the character of any priest, this power was entrusted to persons before the Council of Trent, as it is by the Church of England now; (3.) that the defect, if any, was not absence of jurisdiction, but of qualification; and the object in requiring priests, after the Council of Trent, to receive the approbation of the Bishop, was not to give them any additional jurisdiction, but to secure their having the necessary qualifications. This Suarez says, explicitly:—

“To avoid those dangers, the Council of Trent framed a law, to be explained presently, which its very words will show to be new.” The Parish Priest did receive jurisdiction over his own flock, but over it only. The ground why, by the Council of Trent, any who had leave not to confess to his own priest, was thereby allowed to go to one having cure of souls, and not to any simple unapproved Priest, was, not that he had jurisdiction, and the other not, for he had received jurisdiction over his own flock only; but, that the very fact that he was so entrusted, implied that he was approved by the Bishop as qualified. If he was fit to receive the confessions of his own flock, he was fit to receive those of others. This Suarez says: “Since Bishops are the principal pastors of souls, rightly is this approbation committed to them. But because cure of souls is committed to the Parish Priest also, by this very office he is enough declared to be sufficient to hear confessions; and therefore, although he receives jurisdiction only over his own sheep, yet he is accounted to be approved, so that this jurisdiction can be delegated to him whensoever and in what way soever is otherwise lawful.”

This opinion, Melchior Canus, who, about the time of the Council of Trent, maintained the opposite side⁸, acknowledges to be the common opinion of the moderns. He allows that Graduates in Theology may be chosen without such licence, and denies it only to such as are “not approved by the public authority of a degree in Theology, or at least implicitly permitted by the Bishop.” He separates this question from that of jurisdiction; he does not suppose that this licence gives jurisdiction; for he speaks of a Priest “approved by the Bishop, or his Vicar, although he have none under him, and altogether have no jurisdiction.” He assumes that there is “a precept,” not binding on the penitent but on the priest, “not to hear confessions, if not examined,” of which Vazquez says, “how⁹ this was so, before the Council of Trent, or where there was such a precept, I see not.” There was plainly none. Else, Canus’ grounds are entirely founded on the risk of abuse of such permission. "Among simple Priests, not examined, are many most ignorant, and most profligate." "If the Supreme Pontiff gave a faculty of choosing any Priest, he would thereby make all priests, even the greatest fools [stultissimos], judges in the inward court, which it is most unworthy to ascribe to any except the most pestilent prelates." "Wherefore," he adds, "I hold that if a priest is otherwise approved by a Bishop or his Vicar, according to the custom which well-instructed Bishops observe, then, by a licence of choosing a Confessor, whether given by a Parish Priest, or Bishop, or Supreme Pontiff, he may be chosen, although he have none under him and altogether no jurisdiction. But if any one be rejected by the Bishop, or by the Visitor, as foolish and unfit, such an one cannot be chosen by virtue of the clause of choosing a Confessor. And I think the same of him, who is not examined and approved by a prelate according to the form prescribed by law or by custom. For the contrary opinion, at least, opens a most wide open door to the destruction of the Christian people, when the most ignorant priests are chosen by a most ignorant people." Again, "By that opinion which we are endeavouring to refute, any common ignorant person of the populace¹ may choose a Confessor at his own pleasure, and so weigh and approve him."

But he was standing against the then current. I will mention some of the writers quoted as authorities.

Stephanus Auffreri^{us} states it to be “commonly held” [communiter servatur] that any priest not having cure of souls may absolve in this case; and this, on the ground alleged by Hostiensis², “that from the time that the priest has the power of the keys, he received this power of binding and loosing, in his ordination. But he hath not the exercise, from want of those put under him; whence, from the time that any one may lawfully put himself under him, he may exercise his own power towards him.” And he lays it down as a principle (from l. i. ff. de judic.) that “the jurisdiction of those who have not actually any placed under them, may be extended.”

Adrian [i. e. Pope Adrian VI.], in a work written shortly before the Council of Trent, taught that³ “on the ground of such licence,” [to choose a confessor,] “he may choose any Priest indifferently,” and that such Priest absolves by his own authority. He alleges as principles admitted by those of “the contrary opinion,” that any Priest has jurisdiction towards other Priests; to Bishops and Prelates exempt; also to those at the point of death; as to sins, before confessed, and probably as to venial sins. He alleges also the “common observance and practice of the people. For by virtue of the faculty of choosing a qualified confessor, they go indifferently to any Priest. And certainly, in consecration, the key of power is given to every Priest, which is the power of binding and loosing in the Penitential Court. He has then spiritual jurisdiction, which may suffice for its exercise, if he have but the due matter."

De Palude says, "He ⁵ who may choose a confessor, may take any Priest indifferently, except that a religious, since he has no choice without his superior, ought not to hear [a confession] without the leave of his superior." This exception related to his character, not as a Priest, but as one bound by a vow of obedience to the superior of his Monastery.

Medina says that "some few [nonnulli] Jurists said, that a person who had licence from a curate to confess to another, whom he would, could not, by virtue of that licence, confess to a simple Priest, unless he had cure of souls." He answers, "It seems that it is to be held with the Theologians that any one who has leave to confess to another, may confess to a simple Priest, because Bishops may, (according to Greg. Decr. v. 38. 16.) as is the common practice and custom, which is the best interpreter of laws; so then one may, who has licence from a curate. For the licence is given in the same tenor to both." He adds: "Jurisdiction in the Penitential Court adds nothing above the power of orders, except the subject matter, towards which the Priest may be able to exercise the power. But this he has by the voluntary subjection whereby the parishioner who hath leave to submit himself to whom he will, willeth to submit himself to him.”

Again, he shows that they have just the same jurisdiction as any other Priests, to whom any go, with leave from their own. “It is not true that a simple Priest so chosen, has not at least delegated jurisdiction, consequentially, or mediately, because, in that the Curate gives his parishioner licence to confess to whom he chooses, he, by consequence, puts in his own place the priest so chosen. Else one who had a general licence to choose himself a confessor, whether by law, or Bull, or privilege, could not choose another with cure of souls; for one with cure of souls cannot absolve those placed under another, if he be their ordinary or delegated judge, unless thou say that he is mediately and consequentially delegated, which we too say⁶.”

Again, Angelus de Clavasio⁷ meets the objections of the same Jurists, as Medina. “3. One is said not to have execution of his orders, who hath not a people placed under him: such as religious, habilitated by their prelates, and all secular Priests, who have not cure of souls.” He answers, “The licence to hear [confessions] may well be granted to such [Priests], not only through its being specially committed to them by those who have actually a cure, but also through a Curate's giving licence generally to those under him, to choose whom they will as a confessor." He adds: "Every Priest, in that he is an ordinary Priest, has jurisdiction; the matter alone is wanting on which it should be exercised, and therefore when it comes to him by such licence given generally, he absolves by his own authority which he has, and which he can exercise when the due matter is offered to him.

Lyndwode⁸ (A. D. 1422) quotes the two opposite authorities, Raymundus, A. D. 1230, and [Card.] Hostiensis, A. D. 1250, who was followed by most, afterwards. Of these Hostiensis says, "It sufficeth that a man have licence of his judge, that he may confess to any one specified; nay, or if he have a licence in general, that he may confess to whom he will, or simply that he may confess to another; in these two cases, if he who is under another, goes to one more discreet, whether a religious or other, or (with good reason) to one not so skilful, so he be skilful and of good report, he is safe in confessing, and the other in hearing. But if he have no reason, except that he wishes to hide his sins from his own Priest, or because he despises him, he deceives himself, and ought to repent of this also."

Gregory de Valentia (A. D. 1597) sums up preceding writers⁹, "When one under authority hath the power of confessing to another priest, absolutely, ‘to whom he will,’ from man, i. e. from the ordinary Minister, whether the Pontiff, or Bishop, or Parish Priest, this is not to be understood merely that he may, at his option, confess to any other Parish Priest whatever, or to any other whatever set forth by the Bishop for hearing confessions (as Canus thought, l. c.), but that he may confess altogether to any priest whatever, who in other respects is ‘qualified’ [idoneus] for it. So Theologians commonly hold. According to which opinion, Religious can be chosen, who are not peculiarly hindered by their superiors, so that they cannot validly receive confessions.”

Again, Prosper Fagnanus (an eminent Canonist about A.D. 1660) says, that the Lateran Council, by not requiring the licence of the Bishop, in fact left it free. “By ¹⁰ that decree [of the Council of Trent] the arrangement of our text [c. omnis of the Lateran Council] was taken away, in that part in which it lays down that a stranger priest can hear confession, with the licence of the Parish Priest. For at this day, in a priest not a parish priest, such a licence sufficeth not, but the licence and approbation of the Bishop is required. Before the Council, there was only one hindrance, that no one could confess to a stranger priest without leave of his own, as appears from this Decretal. But at this day another is added (c. 15. sess. 23. of the C. of Trent), i. e. that no one is qualified to hear the confessions of seculars, unless he have a parochial benefice, or be approved by the Bishop."

And to show how entirely this was matter of positive law, even after the Council of Trent, this licence of the Bishop was not required to enable the Confessors of the regulars to hear the confessions of those who formed part of their family and lived at their table, but was required for the servants in their monastery.

There is then no reason to think that the state of things among us, just before the Reformation, did not follow the general law, so that leave not to confess to a person's own Priest was freely given; nor does it appear that here, any more than elsewhere, the general word "Priest," was, by any received custom, limited to one having cure of souls or licensed by the Bishop. The rule of Archbishop Reynolds¹, quoted by Mr. Allies, "let no Priest admit the parishioner of another to penance, save with the licence of his own presbyter or Bishop," implies that he might, with that licence. And it may be said that the Parish Priest required no licence from the Bishop. Hostiensis says expressly, "A² Parish Priest, from the time that cure of souls

² De pœn. et rem. c. cui confit. sit Sacerdoti. f. 296. A contrary opinion had been held by Raymund, "That the Parish is committed to him by any Bishop, without other special licence, hath power to hear the confessions of his own parishioners, to excommunicate and absolve." Nor did he, according to Suarez³, even after the Council of Trent, require any further approbation, in order to receive confessions out of his own diocese.

Let me observe again, this question turns entirely, not on jurisdiction, but on his being known to have the qualifications requisite. Some thought, that according to that Council, it was intended that a Priest with cure of souls, was only to hear confessions within his own diocese, i. e. that since his being entrusted with cure of souls was an approbation by the Bishop who gave him that cure, not by others, he therefore was "approved" for his own diocese, not for others.

Suarez, however, says, "I hold that one so beneficed, according to the intention of the Council, is to be accounted simply qualified, and for any place whatever, so that he is every where proximately capable of jurisdiction, if it be conferred on him by one who can delegate it, either by medium of a Bull, or by some like privilege of choosing a Confessor. Henricus relates that this was the meaning of some most grave prelates, present at the Council, Priest cannot hear confessions, unless power be given him by the Bishop," "which," Goffridus de Trano says, "approveth itself not to me; for parishes are distinct, just as dioceses." L. v. de poen. et rem.

and of all the Theologians and Jurists of Salamanca, and I also am clear as to it." And this on the ground, (1.) that no restriction was to be added to the words of the Council; (2.) that the Council in this made no new law, but retained the old; (3.) if the priest could not be chosen out of his own diocese, he could not, out of his own parish (which he had shown to be false).

Suarez puts the objection, that "one entrusted with cure of souls receives thereby the approval of his own Bishop, but not of others." He answers, "By virtue of the benefice he appears to be approved for such a place or parish, and yet by virtue of the Council, that approbation is accounted sufficient for other parishes, because a public minister, and approved by virtue of his office, ought to be accounted by the Church simply capable of being chosen; therefore."

Mr. Allies' solution of the words in our Prayer Book "me or some other," viz. that "it would of necessity be a priest, who had been appointed by the Bishop for that Diocese or district," does not represent, according to Suarez, the Roman discipline even after the Council of Trent. For even then, one who obtained leave from "his own priest" was not so limited, but might go to any other who had cure of souls. And even this limitation of having cure of souls, had no reference whatever to jurisdiction. His having jurisdiction over his own people, did not give him any jurisdiction over others. Rather, his having jurisdiction over these, excludes, as is self-evident, and as Suarez implies, his having in the same sense, any jurisdiction over others. It was simply a testimonial of his qualifications.

But, before the Council of Trent, i. e. when the words "or some other" were first introduced into our Office for the Communion, they would have been understood as unrestricted, because, in practice, one who obtained leave not to confess to his own priest, was, "according to the Theologians," not restricted. And Suarez expressly meets the objection, that all people would not be judges who would be "qualified" priests and who not, by saying, "people might know it by experience, or public report, or notice, or testimony." Any how, he says, that such was the case before the Council of Trent; so that our people, in being allowed to choose for themselves, if they wish, "some other discreet and learned Priest," are, so far, in the same condition as they were before the Reformation, when they might, if they had leave (which so many thousands had), choose to themselves an "idoneus sacerdos."

II. According, then, to the principles immediately antecedent to the Reformation, a parishioner before whom the Parish Priest said from the Altar, "If⁴ there be any of you whose conscience is troubled and grieved in any thing, lacking comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned Priest, taught in the law of God, and confess and open his sin and grief secretly," would be entitled to go to whom he willed. And this permission of his own Priest, thus given, was understood by the principle of the Church then and since, to authorize the acts of the other. But besides this, even in 1548, the Church in England had made a great change affecting the matter of jurisdiction, by going back to the Pœnitentiale of Theodore, when "some confessed their sins to God alone, some to the priests; and both with great fruit within the Holy Church." For the very principle of apportioned jurisdiction which Mr. Allies speaks of, implies that all the members of the Church are subject to some one to whom they ought to confess their sins. This was appointed by the Council of Lateran, which he quotes: "Let every one of either sex, after he shall have arrived at years of discretion, faithfully confess all his sins to his own priest, at least once in the year, and study to fulfil the penance enjoined to him." The rule that he should confess to his own priest involved a corresponding rule that he was not to confess to another priest without leave. The Western Church then assigned each to a certain priest, to whom it imposed upon him as a duty to confess his sins. It placed each under a certain jurisdiction. But when the Church of England again left it at the option of her members to confess or no, such jurisdiction ceased. That jurisdiction lay in the power to compel confession and refuse absolution, at the discretion of the priest, if the person confessing was judged impenitent, and so to exclude him from Holy Communion. The Church of England has returned to the same state as in the time of St. Chrysostom or St. Augustine, "when many were corrected, as Peter; many were endured, as Judas; many not known, until the Lord come."

Since, then, the people were no longer obliged to "confess to their own Priest," they remained indeed under his pastoral care, but were, *in this respect*⁵, no longer under his jurisdiction; and, consequently, his jurisdiction was not invaded by their going to any other Priest. The two parts of the system, then, in this first book, agreed together. It left people at liberty to "use the auricular and secret confession to the priest," or to be satisfied with "the humble confession to God;" and so doing, it left them free to go to any Priest they would.

It is a maxim in the Roman Church also, "Whoso is not placed under any definite priest, and is in his own power, may confess to whom he will."

"Any one in that which is in his own power,

whenever namely he is bound to no others, may place himself under whom he will."

You will observe, too, that the Church throughout speaks of certain qualifications of the priest, that he should be "discreet and learned," and it does not say any thing about his appointment. She retained these words unchanged among all other changes. Surely, according to any principle of interpretation, when the Church speaks of certain qualities, and uses no other limitation, no one has a right to restrain them, in a way in which the Church has not restrained them. The Council of Lateran, meaning to limit the people to their own priest, enjoins every priest to be "discretus et cautus," but requires that the people should have leave from their own priest to go to any other; otherwise "he could have no power to absolve or to bind him." The Church of England retained the directions as to the qualifications of the priest, but gave her children leave to go to whom they willed, having placed them under no "jurisdiction."

It is inconceivable that she should in a general exhortation have told them so broadly, "let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned priest, taught in the law of God," if she had meant only to allow them to go to a certain person or persons, "extraordinary confessors." She warns them not to trifle in a matter concerning their souls; not to go to a physician who could not heal them, or would heal wounds lightly. Some such there always notoriously are. Others are "had in reputation among the people." People may be tempted to choose those who would be easy with them. It is not, then, an idle warning to bid them choose such as, in common report, are "discreet and learned." But as to these qualifications also a practical change had occurred before this time. The questions as to the "simplex sacerdos," and the laws referred to in them, all related to the monks. But these had, before the Reformation, been scattered by the wanton rapine of Henry VIII. The question was not as to jurisdiction, but as to qualification. Learning was not the object of the monastic orders, much as we are indebted to some orders in all spiritual learning. There would be many Priests in these orders without knowledge adequate to receive confessions; for knowledge was not their object.

After the suppression of these orders by the iron hand of Henry VIII., the "simplex sacerdos," or priest without cure of souls, was among us to be found only in cathedral or collegiate bodies, the members of which, being mostly graduates of theology, were held, as I said, even by the most rigid, to require no licence. In fact, the chief learning in our Church, since the Reformation, has been in those bodies.

The laws which were interpreted as requiring the licence, applied only to bodies which had ceased to be. Since then the licence was only a testimony to qualification: it requires some proof that they were ever meant to extend to bodies, who were possessed of those qualifications more than others. It seems a paradox, that when all the Parochial Clergy were accounted competent to discharge this office (for the very force of the words, "let him come unto me, or &c." implies this), the Clergy of the Universities should not have been accounted "qualified." For the licence, we have seen, was only a public approbation that they were "discreet and learned." It conferred no powers; it only made a person eligible for the office. In the absence of any indication of this in the Prayer Book itself, or any subsequent book, or any account that such licence was ever given by our Bishops since the Reformation, the words "some other" must be taken in their broad, natural sense. The words must mean what in their natural sense they mean, not what any one may suppose they ought to have been. If the Church has put no limitation upon them, others cannot legitimately.

It is a maxim in the Church that "Favours⁶ are to be enlarged." A grant in a person's favour is not to be restrained by any limitation, not expressed in the grant itself. A like attempt was made to limit the choice of one permitted by the law, for ignorance of his own priest, to confess to another. Suarez says, "Some⁷ say, if there be a qualified priest, having elsewhere jurisdiction in this court, although not towards their parishioners, he is to be chosen, c. g. the Incumbent of another Church, rather than a simple Priest; and that the simple priest is only to be chosen, when he is qualified, and no other is at hand who has jurisdiction." Suarez answers, "The jurisdiction of a priest, if it be not towards the penitent himself, is, in itself, irrelevant to this judgment. So then, unless by some special law, this was laid down as a necessary condition in choosing a priest, there is no reason why it should be required. But here there is no law requiring such a condition."

But, besides this, there are some indirect and one distinct intimation, that Cranmer did not mean to impose any restrictions. In the Articles of 1536, the "Institution of a Christian Man," and the "Necessary Erudition," although they have, severally, chapters on the "Sacrament of Penance," there is no mention whatever of the subject of jurisdiction. It is some indication of the meaning of Cranmer, that the authority is said to be vested in the priest, without any thing being said as to the question of the "proprius sacerdos," commonly treated of since the Council of Lateran. But in the Catechism published by him, and which he says "I wrot," the choice is distinctly left free. "God^s dothe not speake to us with a voyce soundyng out of heaven. But He hath given the kayes of the kingdom of heaven, and the authoritie to forgyve synne, to the ministers of the Churche. Wherefore let him that is a sinner go to one of them, let him knowledge and confesse his synne, and praye him that according to God's commaundemente, he will gyve him absolution, and comforte him with the word of grace and forgiveness of his synnes. And when the minister dothe so, then I ought stedfastly to believe that my synnes are truly forgiven me in heaven." "One of them" in the Catechism corresponds with "me or some other" in the exhortation.

In the Article "on Penitence" among Archbishop Cranmer's papers⁹, and corrected by him, the doctrine of penitence, as a remedy for sin after Baptism, is set forth; "the auricular confession" in private to the ministers of the Church, is said to be very useful and most highly necessary. It is declared that in "private absolution the priest has power to absolve one confessing, from all his sins, even those which are wont to be called 'reserved cases;' only that for manifest crimes (if he be brought to justice), he is subject to public judgments."

Besides this, the remission of sins, there are, it is said, "other advantages of secret confession, one of which is that unlearned and unskilful men can never be [more conveniently] or better instructed as to Christian doctrine than in confession [if they but gain (nacti fuerint) a learned and pious confessor"]. The words in brackets are Cranmer's suggestions, which were adopted by others, whoever these were. Cranmer insists on certain qualities in the confessor, makes no mention of any restriction, and uses a word most naturally understood of the penitent's obtaining a confessor for himself.

III. But, surely, it is plainly and entirely wrong to bind down the meaning of a practical direction, spoken to each of us, whenever we come to Holy Communion, to a possible limitation which some think might have been true in 1548.

It surely is a plain principle, that a practical direction of the Church, renewed at different intervals, must be interpreted with reference to the circumstances under which that direction can be carried out. A practical direction renewed, is not like even a practical direction enacted once for all. When the Church renews a direction, she must mean it to be carried out. And if there is only one way in which it can be carried out, she must mean it to be carried out in that. She cannot mean a practical earnest direction which she gives, to be restrained by limitations, unexpressed and impossible.

Now this direction, that persons troubled in conscience were to go either to the Parish Priest, "or some other discreet and learned minister," was renewed in 1549, the date of the first book in Edward VI.'s reign, and in 1552 (as Mr. Allies first wrote), the date of the second; in 1560, in Queen Elizabeth's reign; in 1604, the Hampton Court Conference; and in 1661, the Savoy Conference.

The Prayer Book having been under review at those times, and altered in those things which it was then thought expedient to alter, what remained was, at those several times, re-enacted. The very words which he quotes of our Prayer Book are not those of 1548, the date which he fixes; nor of 1552, exactly.

The words were under consideration in 1552, for the context was then considerably altered. Four years had elapsed. But Cranmer retained the words "some other discreet and learned."

Again, at the revision of the Prayer Book, after it had been set aside in Mary's reign, it was considered by other persons; yet the words were retained. We know well the appointments in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and that there were no "Penitentiary Priests appointed." The word "some other," then, cannot have meant "one appointed by the Bishop for that diocese or district." We should have known also, had licences to hear confessions been granted. It was not necessary, according to Roman writers, or became so only by law, not in force in England. It may not be assumed without proof.

Again, one alteration in this very exhortation, made after 1552, is not verbal; but the very fact of any, even verbal alteration, however slight, would show that it was re-considered and re-appointed. It is notorious that the Office for Holy Communion was under consideration and in part altered back in 1560; but this direction remained as appointed in 1552. Its present form was adopted after the Savoy Conference. It first appears in 1662. The alteration is but slight; but the intention is plain, to direct the mind of Churchmen the more to absolution. In the second book under Edward VI., after the words "open his grief," it proceeds "that [he may receive such ghostly counsel, advice, and comfort, as his conscience may be relieved, and that] by the ministry of God's word, he may receive [comfort and] the benefit of absolution¹, to the quieting of his conscience, and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness." Since the Savoy Conference, the words in [] have been omitted; and after the word "absolution" is inserted "with ghostly advice and counsel." The change is slight, but it shows that the clause was under consideration then, and re-enacted. As far as it goes, by omitting the word "comfort," and the change of order, it makes the "benefit of absolution" the one object of the application, and "the ghostly advice and comfort" subordinate to it.

Yet confession was used in the earlier times also since the Reformation. It is implied in the language of Bishop Andrewes². Mr. Allies mentions the instance of Hooker and Saravia. Now these were priests. They clearly had no "jurisdiction" over one another in that narrower sense, nor did they receive any. Yet surely they understood what the Church, by her then recent regulations, meant for her children. They used confession to one another, by the common custom of their Church, before the Council of Trent.

² See Entire Absolution of the Penitent, Sermon. ii. p. 10.

Again, the Canon of 1604, by prohibiting (as did the Council of Lateran) any priest from "revealing crimes committed to his trust or secrecy by any who should confess his secret and hidden sins to the minister," proves the practice to have been common then. Canons are made with reference to existing practice.

An incidental notice of the recognition of auricular confession in the English Church at this time, comes from an unexpected quarter. Panzani, an Oratorian, was sent by the Pope to "pacify³ the dissensions between the secular and regular Clergy, respecting the appointment of a Bishop; but still to discover, if possible, his Majesty's sentiments on that point, and his general views respecting the Catholics."

In his report he gives an account of the state of religion in the English Church also, and says on this point, "the practice of auricular confession is praised." He seems to be speaking especially, perhaps, of "public sermons before the King and Court."

³ His account is dated 1627: see Butler, Hist. Mem. vol. ii. p. 339.

But fuller and directer evidence as to the meaning of the words "and some other," is given by Visitation Articles, from 1619 to 1679, founded on the Canon of 1604.

The Visitation Articles of Bishop Overall, 1619, Bishop Andrewes, 1629, Montague, 1638, Wren, 1662, Gunning, 1679 (and there are others⁴), are cast in the same mould, and are founded on the Exhortation in the Communion Office, and the Canons of 1604. They inquire, 1. as to the persons excommunicated, and of their obtaining their absolution; 2. Whether the minister exhorteth those troubled or disquieted to open their griefs, that they may by the minister receive "the benefit of absolution;" 3. Whether the minister have revealed any crimes or offences, so committed to his trust and secrecy, contrary to the 113th Canon.

⁴ Those by Juxon, Bishop of London, 1640, and Fuller, Bishop of Lincoln, 1668, inquire "whether the minister exhorts the sick, and move him, and that most earnestly, to liberalitie towards the poor, and to unburden his conscience; whether the priest thereupon give him absolution according to the form prescribed; and whether that they had ever heard that the minister hath revealed and made known to any person or persons whatsoever, any crime or offence committed to his trust and secrecy, either in case of such extremity, or any other case whatsoever; except, &c. . . ." These are indications of confession being recommended by Bishops, and of its practice; and imply that it was not confined to the sick bed, but do not directly bear on the words "or some other." The Articles of R. Pory, Archdeacon of Middlesex, 1662, agree with these. Mr. Maskell, Doctrine of Absolution, c. 7, p. 137, mentions some Articles of the Diocese of Peterborough, 1636, as agreeing with those in the text, with which I am unacquainted.

Bishop Overall, Bishop Andrewes, and Bishop Wren's inquiries are in the same words.

Bishop Montague has a separate article on the visitation of the sick, and in other respects uses language of his own:—

“Doth he comfort him as concerning his soul's health, his state to Godward? doth he, upon hearing of his confession, which he shall persuade him to make, absolve him from his sins, settle his faith, affiance, and confidence in God? and hath he at any time discovered any part of his confession?” (Visitation of the Sick, tit. 6. § 18.)

Again, “Tit. 7. Concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.”

§ 2. “Is any public, notorious, scandalous offender admitted thereto, without satisfaction made unto the Church, reconciliation with enemies, confession of his faults, and promise made of amendment?”

§ 3. “To which end and intent doth the minister admonish his parishioners to conform themselves, that they receive not their own damnation, as not discerning the Lord's Body?”

§ 4. “Doth he especially exhort them to make confession of their sins to himself, or some other learned, grave, and discreet minister, especially in Lent, against that holy time of Easter, that they may receive comfort and absolution, so to become worthy receivers of such sacred mysteries?"

Bishop Wren a little varies the question as to the revelation of sins confessed.

Bishop Gunning asks:

"If any person sick or in health (especially before receiving Holy Communion), finding his conscience troubled with any weighty matter, doth for the quieting thereof, and for further comfort and counsel, unburden his conscience to his priest or minister, doth then the said Priest or Minister, upon special confession of his sins made, together with fruits meet for repentance having been performed (to both which also he is by the Minister to be invited), upon his repentance administer to him absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice; and have you heard that the said Priest or Minister hath revealed or made known, at any time, to any person whatsoever, directly or indirectly, any crime or offence confessed to him in secret by any such penitents (except^s such crimes as by the laws endanger his life)?"—(Can. 113.)

Here we have Bishops applying this direction of the Prayer Book. We know that there were no priests specially appointed for "that diocese or district." Yet the Bishops, using the words of the exhortation, inquire whether the minister exhorted his people to resort to him, or some other learned minister, and open his grief, that he may receive the benefit of absolution. The Bishops take the words "let him come to me, or to some other," &c. in their plain natural sense, applying them to every parish in their diocese in which they knew that they had appointed no persons with especial authority to this end. They thus show their belief that the Church did not restrain the power of the keys entrusted to the Priest, to the parish wherein his ministrations lay, provided that others sought him, not he sought others. The only limitation is, that the person who could not "quiet his conscience" should "come to him."

Again the Church of England having given this freedom to her children to choose whom they would, for an office requiring such especial tenderness and discretion, no where restrains the Priest. There are Canons of 1604 prohibiting Priests from exercising certain of their functions in ways tending to irregularity. They are forbidden to preach and administer the Communion in private houses (except in certain cases), to appoint public or private fasts, or exorcise, except by authority. Nay, nearer still, parishioners are expressly forbidden to refuse⁶ "to have their children baptized by a Minister, that is no Preacher, and to receive the Holy Communion at his hands in the same respect, as though the virtue of those sacraments did depend upon his ability to preach ;"

and all Ministers are forbidden to "receive to the Communion any such persons which are not of his own Church and parish, or to baptize any of their children, thereby strengthening them in their said errors." "Excommunication" is the punishment for the laity who so offend; "suspension" for the minister who receives them.

But there is no restriction whatever on the plain meaning of the direction to those who could not quiet their consciences, to go "to some other discreet and learned Minister," or restraining these from ministering to them, when they should come for the benefit of absolution. The words do restrain us in one point, that we are not to draw away others to ourselves, as was done in the contests of old between the regular and secular Clergy. We are not to obtrude, nor to offer, our services; not to set up ourselves as guides, or depreciate others; we are to be passive, ready to minister to any who "come" to us, but not to cause confusion and heart-burning by intruding, through any act or word of ours, into the ministry of others.

In a word, the Church of England, in that she bids each of her ministers exhort his parishioners to come unto him, or to "some other," leads them to think of him as the most natural person to whom to go; but if there be any reason why, for an office in which the Church would wish to deal so tenderly, they should prefer "some other," she gives them leave to go.

The Bishops at the Savoy Conference had the other part of the power of the keys, excommunication, before them. They added to the Rubric about repelling persons from Holy Communion, if notorious evil livers, or in malice. And lest the Parish Priest should act arbitrarily in this, they provided that if he so repelled any, he should give an account to the Ordinary within fourteen days at furthest. Yet though changing this, and restricting the Parish Priest from virtually excommunicating, and having at the same time this exhortation under their consideration, in that they altered it slightly, and brought out the benefits of Absolution a little more prominently, they retained the words "some other discreet and learned Minister," when they could not by any possibility be understood, except as leaving it wholly to the option of each person to choose in whom he could most confide the sorrows of his soul.

The Priests of the Church of England are plainly under no restriction; for there is absolutely no mention of us or of our confessions. It is to me an absolute paradox to say that the Church of England meant to put a restraint upon the people which she does not put upon us, when she no where expresses it.

This is decisive as to the English Church. The words in her exhortation are living words; they are an actual reality; they are renewed, whenever they are pronounced; they speak, whenever they are read; they have spoken to thousands and tens of thousands of broken, anxious, burthened, hearts; they are the voice of the Church of England, and of God through her, speaking to people's consciences, and they were heard and understood. As you have often heard me say, and felt yourself, this revival of Confession was not the doing of man but of God. They whose hearts were oppressed by the memory of past sin, sought those whom God appointed to be physicians of souls, and to whom the words had been said, "Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted to them." They understood the Church to tell them in plain words, to tell them to go either to their Parish Priests, or to whomsoever else they could best bear to lay "open their griefs," the very inmost, tenderest, recesses of their soul.

Surely the concurrent interpretation which so many thousands have put upon these words, is some indication what the Church means by them.

But indeed, if persons would think a little, the Church can mean nothing else by them. She cannot, in so solemn a matter, be using unmeaning words; yet, of course, they would be utterly unmeaning, if "some other discreet and learned Minister" meant no one, but some Priests whom the Bishop might have sanctioned if he would.

"With us," says Dean Comber, "it [confession] is restored to its Primitive use, for we direct all men always to confess to God; but some also to confess their faults and reveal their doubts to the Priest, especially in these three cases; (1.) When we are disquieted with the guilt of some sin already committed; or (2.) when we cannot conquer some lust or passion; or (3.) when we are afflicted with any intricate scruples, particularly whether we may not be fit to receive this blessed Sacrament or no. If any of these be our case, then first we must choose prudently, preferring our own Minister, if he be tolerably fitted, or else we may elect another that is prudent and pious, learned and judicious; one who may manage this weighty concern gravely and privately, and dispatch it wisely and fully to our satisfaction."

You will observe, too, that eminent Bishops, whose works have been popular among us, and who knew what practice they sanctioned, assume that the Church intended to leave that freedom. Bishop (then Dr.) Cosin, A.D. 1627, was commissioned by Bishop White to draw up his manual; when drawn up, Mountain, Bishop of London, put the imprimatur with his own hand. It is said to have been held in most esteem next to the Prayer Book. Among "the precepts of the Church," he sets down⁷: "To receive the Blessed Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ with frequent devotion, and three times a year at least, of which times Easter to be always one. And for better preparation thereunto, as occasion is, to disburthen and quiet our consciences of those sins that may grieve us, or scruples that may trouble us, to a learned and discreet Priest, and from him to receive advice, and the benefit of absolution."

In like way, Bishop Sparrow says: "He that would be sure of pardon, let him seek out a priest, and make his humble confession to him; for God, who alone hath the prime and original right of forgiving sins, hath delegated the priests His judges here on earth, and given them the power of absolution; so that they can, in His Name, forgive the sins of those that humbly confess unto them ⁸."

And Bishop Taylor, A.D. 1659, in a book which to this day is still one of the most popular of our religious books ⁹: "Let the minister of religion be sent to, not only against the agony of death, but be advised with in the whole conduct of the sickness." "When the man is deadly sick, he cannot be called upon to confess his sins, and he is not able to remember them." "St. James advises, that when a man is sick, he should send for the elders." "Whether they be many or few that are sent to the sick person, let the curate of his parish, or his own confessor, be amongst them; that is, let him not be wholly advised by strangers, who know not his particular necessities ; but he that is the ordinary judge cannot safely be passed by in his extraordinary necessity, which in so great portions depends upon his whole life past ; and it is a matter of suspicion, when we decline his judgment that knows us best, and with whom we formerly did converse, either by choice, or by law, by private election or public constitution."

Where, you will observe, Bishop Taylor presupposes that people had their "own confessors," and this by their own free choice, while he implies that the Church might, "by public constitution," appoint such persons if she willed ; and perhaps he might think that the word "me," coming before "some other," carries with it a certain preference of the Parish Priest himself.

In the "Holy Living," he speaks in the same way : "In all which circumstances, because we may be very much helped, if we take in the assistance of a spiritual guide ; therefore the Church of God, in all ages, hath commended, and in most ages enjoined, that we confess our sins, and discover the state and condition of our souls, to such a person, whom we or our superiors judge fit to help us in such needs¹."

And in the "Golden Grove" (of which eighteen editions were printed in twenty-five years after his death), "Confess your sins often, hear the word of God, make religion the business of your life, your study, and chiefest care; and be sure that in all things a spiritual guide take you by the hand ²."

It may be observed, too, how familiarly Bishop Taylor³ speaks of "guides of souls," in connexion with confession; or how Evelyn⁴ speaks of his child's letter to a Divine, to whom she writes, that he would "be her ghostly father," and relates how he himself had delayed recommending one to her, "seeing her apt to be scrupulous, and knowing the great innocency and integrity of her life."

In like way, the Bishop, (whether Bishop Taylor⁵ himself or Bishop Duppa,) who wrote the "Guide for the Penitent" (a work as popular as the "Golden Grove," and, since Bishop Taylor's decease, always united with it): "That, besides this examination of your conscience (which may be done in secret between God and your own soul), there is great use of holy confession; which, though it be not generally in all cases, and peremptorily commanded, as if without it no salvation could possibly be had; yet you are advised by the Church, under whose discipline you live, that before you are to receive the Holy Sacrament, or when you are visited with any dangerous sickness, if you find any one particular sin, or more, that lies heavy upon you, to disburden yourself of it into the bosom of your confessor, who not only stands between God and you to pray for you, but hath the power of the keys committed to him, upon your true repentance, to absolve you in Christ's Name from those sins which you have confessed to Him."

"That, having made choice of such a confessor who is every way qualified that you may trust your soul with him, you are advised plainly and sincerely to open your heart to him." "That for the frequency of doing this, you are to consult with your own necessities."

But indeed Mr. Allies entirely concedes this point. For he says⁶, "When in the times of James and Charles, our Divines had risen to higher notions of the Church and its functions, they supposed this power of inward spiritual jurisdiction to reside in Bishops and priests." But since this was so, then, when they used the words "or some other," the less can there be reason for restraining the force of that phrase. There is no indication that they thought that either the spiritual good of individuals, or the good order of the Church, required any such restriction. And, according to this statement, they could not have held it to be required for the right use of the power of the keys.

I have not examined the case in which Collier absolved publicly two persons at the place of execution. The objection raised against that absolution is, that he is supposed not to have moved⁷ them at that time to make a special confession of their sins, at least of those sins for which they were condemned. And on the other side, here were persons absolved that did not humbly desire absolution, as feeling any such "weighty matter to trouble their conscience." The objection is, that there is supposed to have been, at all events, one very grievous sin which they did not confess as a sin, but are alleged to have gloried in^s. The charge brought against Collier⁹ is, that either he did not know the state of their souls, and then he could not "without manifest transgression of the Church's order, as well as the profane abuse of the power Christ has left with His ministers, absolve them from all their sins;" or if he did, that, by absolving them, he declared the part which they had taken against William not to be sin.

We have then the implied statement of the fourteen Bishops who signed the censure of Collier, (all who were within reach at the time, and the majority of the whole,) that if the persons absolved had confessed all their sins, and humbly asked for absolution, "the Church's order" would not have been transgressed.

To sum up this evidence briefly.

1. The relation of the flock to the parish priest in respect to confession was changed when it was again

^s It appears from this account that they were not implicated in the sin of attempting to assassinate William III.; but one knew of the intention. What they gloried in, seems to have been the attempt to restore King James to the throne.

⁹ Collier alone seems to have been their confessor; the other two priests appear to have expressed their concurrence only.

left free to each individual, and a matter of his own conscience personally, whether he should confess or no. He was no longer placed under the jurisdiction of the Parish Priest in this respect; and so, by confessing to another, he did not (as he would have done before, when it was compulsory) violate any relation towards the Parish Priest.

2. Together with this change, there occurs an invitation to those who cannot otherwise quiet their conscience, to unburthen it with a view to the benefit of Absolution. In this invitation, each Parish Priest is directed by the Church to say, "Let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned Minister of God's Word," thereby formally releasing them, by direction of the Church, from any necessity of coming to himself, and in broad absolute terms bidding them, if they desired it, to go to some other.

3. Leave so given by the Parish Priest, was contemplated, before the Reformation, as amply sufficient to entitle the parishioner to go to any other Priest, and convey to that Priest (whosoever he might be) jurisdiction to receive the confession, and absolve the penitent.

4. Priests, having cure of souls, did not, before the Reformation, require any licence from any Bishop to receive in his Diocese the confession of any one who came with leave from his Parish Priest, whether given to him individually, or generally to the whole parish. The best authorities before the Reformation held that Monks, being Priests, though without cure of souls, equally did not require any licence.

5. The laws, which were supposed by some to lay restriction on those without cure of souls, related solely to the Monks, and the restriction was thought to be founded on their duties, as Monks.

6. The objection, as far as there was any, related not to their not having cure of souls, or jurisdiction, but to the risk of their not being qualified for the office, like the Parish Priest. On this ground, graduates of Theology, being regarded as qualified, were accounted by all to require no licence. In the Church of England since the Reformation, this doubt would not apply to Priests not having cure of souls, as belonging to the bodies who have had most learning.

7. No proof is, or can be, adduced, of any restriction having been ever placed upon this concession. But it is a received maxim in the law of the Church, that concessions are not to be restricted beyond their plain meaning; and custom is accounted to justify any practice which is not directly against positive law, nor formally revoked by the Bishop.

8. The Church of England, while making other regulations to prevent contempt of the Parish Priest, or irregular exercise of the Priestly Office, never put any limitation upon this, nor did she ever appoint, or show any indication of a wish to appoint, nor did her Bishops ever recommend, any definite persons to hear confessions, so that the words "or some other" should be in any way restrained,

9. The Service in which the words "or some other" occur has been five times renewed; three times, at least, it has been under deliberate consideration; alterations have twice been made in the exhortation itself, in 1552 and 1661; yet these words have been deliberately retained, when they could have no meaning at all, except in their unconditional sense, as leaving each individual entirely free to whom to unburthen his conscience.

10. Bishops, in their Visitation Articles, have expressly quoted these words, in reference to Confession, when they could not be understood in any limited sense. Other Bishops, whose works have ever been received in our Church, speak of the choice as being left free to individuals.

11. The Canons of 1604 imply the existence of the habit of confession, but impose no restriction. Yet, if confession was contemplated or used at all, the words "or some other" must, century after century, have been taken in their unrestrained sense, since there was no other sense in which they could be taken. No persons being appointed by the Bishops to receive confessions, "some other discreet and learned Minister of God's Word," could only be some other Priest, so accounted and esteemed.

12. There is not a vestige of any other interpretation of the words during three centuries.

It is clear then, that we have rightly interpreted the direction of the Church, in which God has made us Priests, in that we freely received and ministered to those, who, by virtue of her direction, came to us. There is, however, one statement in the letter, which it is best to explain, because, as it stands, it might imply that there had been interference with others, or neglect of Episcopal authority. It speaks of "the authority which has been exercised by some, not only in our own Dioceses, but in other Dioceses, often without the knowledge, and probably (were it known) it would be against the consent both of Parish Priest and Bishop."

I suppose that the word "authority" is not used in a popular sense; for in that sense, none, as far as I know, has been exercised, except as far as individuals themselves have desired it, to protect them against themselves, or as it has been necessary to prevent their relapsing into a besetting sin. True repentance requires any person to avoid (when he lawfully may) any temptation which he has found by experience to be too strong for him. It would be trifling with God's ordinance, and with people's souls and our own, to give absolution to one who would not abstain from a proximate occasion of sin. But I doubt not that by the word "authority" you mean what the Church means when she bids us say, "by His authority committed unto me, I absolve thee from all thy sins, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

I say this, lest this word "authority" should be popularly misunderstood. In like way I fear that that other expression may be misunderstood, that "this authority would, if known, be against the consent both of Parish Priest and Bishop."

To take these separately. If a Parish Priest should object, because he objected to confession in itself with a view to the benefit of absolution; then he, by that very objection, the more sets free the individual, otherwise under his pastoral care. For the Church directed him to bid them come to himself, or "some other." If he will not receive them himself, then there can be no semblance of disrespect in going to "some other." His own pastoral authority is derived from the Church. He cannot employ it lawfully in discouraging that which the Church sanctions. In the cases in which I have myself exercised this office, I know of no case in which I had reason to think that the Parish Priest would have objected to it. I had often the use of their churches for the office.

Again, with respect to our Bishops. We ought not to assume that our Bishops would object to what we do, by virtue of the directions in the Prayer Book. We ought rather to assume that so long as we keep strictly to those directions, they would approve of what we do. There might be cases in which Priests might seem to be going beyond what the Prayer Book entitles us; e. g. if we were to press confession indiscriminately, or to teach persons whose own consciences did not move them to it, to use it systematically. Again, Bishops, it is possible, may have discouraged this or that individual, who, they thought, would use it indiscreetly, or urge it beyond what the Church (in the opinion of any such Bishop) recommends, or use it (as they might suppose) as part of a system which would draw people away from the Church. But I cannot believe it possible that any English Bishop would bid us send away those who came to us with burthened consciences or oppressed hearts, without the one remedy which they had, for years perhaps, longed and prayed for with their whole hearts. Still less can I imagine that any Bishop, to whom any of us could tell, in general terms, the blessed fruits of this ministry, could hesitate for a moment to bless God for His work.

If any of us did not go to the Bishop, it was, I doubt not, because the Church, having given the leave already, there was no occasion to apply to the Bishop, who could only direct us to the rule of the Church. The Church does require that “when¹ any such persons, as are of riper years, are to be baptized, timely notice shall be given to the Bishop;” but she gives no directions that we should apply to the Bishop, as to the use of the power of the keys, which she has without restriction intrusted to us. Her direction in the one case illustrates her silence in the other. We had no more occasion to apply to them for leave to receive those who, by virtue of the Church's direction, "came to" us, than for every other act of our office, in detail.

It is with great reluctance that I speak of myself. Yet since I have, from time to time, seen in Roman Catholic journals exaggerated statements as to what I have done, and as I may seem to be, with some few others, chiefly intended in this statement, I will mention it generally.

It is now some twelve years, I suppose, since I was first called upon to exercise this office. The more earnest preaching and teaching of repentance, which began in Oxford about 1835, drove people to look for a remedy for post-baptismal sin. The grievousness of "deadly sin, willingly committed after Baptism" (Art. 16), had been dwelt upon; but no other remedy pointed out than repentance proportioned to the sin, that so it might be washed out by the Blood of Christ. But persons' consciences needed some present comfort. They could not "quiet" them for themselves. They found the peace they longed for in the teaching of their Prayer Book. God taught them through it. The Church spoke to them by a "living voice;" for God made her words live in their ears and in their heart. In this place, as you know, we are under no Bishop. There is no jurisdiction. The Colleges are extra-parochial; the University is exempt from Episcopal jurisdiction. Here, as you would suppose, there must be many tender hearts, anxious about their salvation, to minister to, and here has been my chief ministry to souls in this way. Then also priests came to me, who are plainly under no jurisdiction; many, because having been asked to receive the confessions of others, the office of ministering to these made them think the more that they themselves needed the same remedy. In like way, when residing elsewhere, I could not but conceive myself included in the Church's words, "or some other;" and so, when any came to me, I ministered to them. But not having a parochial cure, I have not led others to confession. I felt, too, that God's work is deeper than man's. Except before the University, in which I was preaching on the comforts for the penitent, I have preached repentance, review of life, rather than confession and absolution, because the soul must first feel itself wounded, before it can look for a cure; the heart must be broken first, before it can be bound up.

Again, as to continued confession, I suppose that there was no office, from which we at first shrank so much, as the receiving continued confessions. This too (as you know) was not produced by any scheme or system of our own, but, against our wishes (so much did we shrink from the office), by the very necessity of the case. For, as I have before said publicly, "It is well known that one who has once tasted 'the benefits of absolution' for heavier sins, and found good for his soul in the special counsels of God's ministers, longs mostly to continue to 'open his griefs' for slighter sins into which he afterwards falls, that he finds it a healthful discipline for his soul, a safeguard often, by God's grace, against sin; that God gives him thereby lightness and gladness of heart, 'to go on his way,' through the wilderness, 'rejoicing.' Is such an one to be repelled? Is he to be told that the remedy he seeks for is only for those more deeply wounded, or bid go into other folds, if he still would have it ²?"

I mention this now, because it has occasioned me to continue to receive confessions, from time to time, in other dioceses than my own. For all who have any experience, know that he can most effectually minister to a soul, build it up, speak to it, comfort it, who knows the whole extent of its griefs.

We have all of us, in this, acted with implicit faith in the teaching of our Church, and avowed that we received those who sought our help. My own sermons on the subject, which implied that I had been in the habit of receiving confessions, were preached in the most public congregation I could have, one in which I had no favour to look to ³; and, as it happened, the first was in the presence of the Bishop of the Diocese, in which the University is situated. They were subsequently published to the Church.

Probably the writer of the letter had a different system in his mind, in which one who should receive confessions “against the will of the Parish Priest,” would be thereby withdrawing from his care a soul intrusted to him for this purpose, and to whom he could, from circumstances, well minister. I will only say, that I know of no such case.

This part of the subject relates only to some of the acts of individuals, more or fewer. For Mr. Allies allows that no question can be raised, as to those who have cure of souls, within the district where they have that cure. But I suppose that the question which Mr. Allies first raised in his pamphlet, is involved also in this letter.

“If this is the system of the Church of England, had the Church of England a right to adopt it? Had the Church of England a right to leave her children free to choose to what Priest they should open their griefs, in order to receive ‘the benefit of absolution?’”

Mr. Allies raises two classes of doubts; the one founded on abstract principles, the other on what he supposes to have been the uniform practice of the Church. Of these, the abstract principles, of course, presuppose the practice and depend upon it. The force of abstract principles in matters of religion, is to explain what we already know, to remove objections founded upon reason, not to be the foundation of any article of faith or practice. Human reason, purified by God’s grace, agrees with and illustrates God’s appointments. There is a harmony also between natural objects, as formed by the Hand of God, or civil institutions, (as far as man's reason was guided by Him,) and the Divine institutions; but the things of nature or of man can neither be the measure, nor the interpreters of the things of God.

We will then consider the practice first. Mr. Allies says, "We can find in the first fifteen centuries of the Church's history no trace of any such power being allowed to reside in priests, in virtue merely of their ordination: on the contrary, the further we go back, the stricter appears to be the dependence of the priest on his Bishop in all such acts, until, in the first ages, we find the Bishop alone in person receiving penitents, and admitting them to absolution."

And, in like way, in Mr. Allies' pamphlet (p. 5): "These are not rules and principles of the Modern Church, or of the Western Church merely; but of the Ancient and Catholic Church. For many hundred years this power of absolution seems to have been exercised immediately by the Bishop, or by priests living in common with him, and under his immediate superintendence." And he appeals in proof to the case of St. Cyprian and the lapsed.

As to the early Church, Mr. Allies blends two very different things; the restoration of public offenders from excommunication, or a state of excommunication, and the private exercise of the power of the keys. In England, too, now, a priest undelegated could not interfere in a case of excommunication. Such was the case of the lapsed under St.

Cyprian. They had, if but for a short time, under tortures, denied Christ, and were apostates. St. Cyprian rules that they were to be received back again, after public confession and penitence, publicly “with imposition of hands by the Bishop and Clergy⁴.” This was a case in which even St. Cyprian would not decide by himself. The tone of his several letters on the subject⁵, to the martyrs and confessors, his clergy, the laity, the Roman Clergy, inviting their concurrence in the common remedy for this wide-spread evil, shows that it was one of the most anxious trials in his whole life. “A great sin, which has spread with incredible desolation over almost the whole world, ought only, as you write, to be dealt with, with caution and moderation, in a consultation of all the Bishops, Presbyters, Deacons, Confessors, and laymen who have stood fast, as you yourself in your letters testify⁶.” “All the Bishops in Africa and Italy had agreed that nothing should be done until all had met together, and by mutual advice settled some sentence, tempered alike with discipline and mercy⁷.”

It was a new and dreadful case, affecting the Church widely; and for which, therefore, it was of moment that one consistent remedy should be provided by the Church. Presbyters, who acted against this, acted in contumacy, “rebelling against this our counsel [that of the collective Episcopate], and all Sacerdotal [Episcopal] authority and power is destroyed by factious conspiracies." One who persevered in this contumacy, after repeated warning, was excommunicated by the Bishops, not for reconciling penitents, but for restoring apostates, against the judgments of the Bishops collectively; and the same punishment was enacted for the future⁸. Even a Bishop was reprimanded by a Synod for so doing⁹.

Of the African Councils again, the Second Council of Carthage, c. 4, and the Third, c. 32, relate to the restoration of those, who, for very great sins, were subjected to public penance, and were excommunicate.

Conc. Carth. ii. c. 4: "If any one be in imminent peril, and desires to be reconciled to the altar of God, if the Bishop be absent, the Presbyter ought to consult the Bishop, and so by his command reconcile him who is in peril."

Conc. Carth. iii. c. 32: "That the Presbyter shall not, without consulting the Bishop, reconcile the penitent, save in the absence of the Bishop, and necessity so compelling; but of whatsoever penitent the crime shall be public and spread widely abroad, which the whole Church knows, let hands be laid upon him before the apse."

Again, the Second Council of Carthage, c. 3, distinctly prohibits Presbyters from restoring peni- tents at the public offices, and places this amongst other Episcopal offices. So does the Second Council of Seville, A.D. 618, c. 7; and the Council of Agde, A.D. 506, c. 44. The same is forbidden to Presbyters by the Council of Eliberis, A.D. 205, and of Ticino, A.D. 850. In the books of Divine Offices, under the name of Alcuin, but probably of the eleventh century, it is spoken of among the Episcopal offices.

Conc. Carth. ii. c. 3: "I remember, it was decreed in the past Council, that the Chrism and reconciliation of penitents, and the consecration of virgins also, should not be done by Presbyters. What say you to this? All the Bishops said, 'Let not the making of Chrism, and the consecration of virgins, take place by the Presbyters, and that a Presbyter shall not be allowed to reconcile any one in the public mass, in this all agree.'"

Conc. Hisp. ii. c. 7: "Nor may they publicly reconcile any penitent in the mass."

Conc. Agath. c. 44: "A Presbyter shall in no wise be allowed to speak the benediction over the people in the Church, nor to bless a penitent in the Church."

Concil. Elib. c. 32: "If any one by a grievous lapse shall have fallen into destruction and death, it hath seemeth good that he should perform penitence, not with the Presbyter, but with the Bishop; but sickness requiring, the Presbyter ought to give him Communion, or a Deacon if the Priest commands him."

Conc. Ticin. c. 7: "The reconciliation of penitents, according to the institution of the ancient Canon, ought to be performed, not by Presbyters, but by Bishops, unless any one shall be in peril of life, and devoutly desire to be reconciled. If the Bishop be absent, the Presbyter ought to consult him, and so to reconcile the penitent by his direction. Else, as neither the making of the Chrism, nor the consecration of virgins, so neither ought the reconciling of penitents to be in any way performed by Presbyters."

The Council of Worms (A. D. 868), Can. 8, limited the prohibition to the public reconciliation only, and that, in the same words, and in connexion with the same episcopal acts, as the older Canons: "neither may he publicly in the mass reconcile any of the penitents."

In the Council of Seiligenstadt (A. D. 1022), Can. 10, "It was decreed that none of the Presbyters, except by command of the Bishop, should presume to bring into the Church any one to whom for any crime it is not allowed to enter it." The prohibition in the Council of Seville was extended to the Chorepiscopi also, in an extract from a spurious Epistle, incorporated into the Decretals¹, as St. Leo's. The name of the Chorepiscopi was inserted also wrongly in copies of the Council of Seville.

Morinus, having mentioned these Councils, says:

“Since, then, the public and solemn reconciliation alone was in all ages forbidden to Presbyters, it is manifest that the private was permitted to them².” He accounts for the different practice among the modern Greeks on the ground that the penitence of the Greeks approaches nearer to the public form, than that of Latins of this day.

Gratian again (A.D. 1131) observes on the Council of Agde³: “Lo, one excommunicated by a Bishop cannot be reconciled by a priest. But it must be observed that public and private absolutions are different. Public reconciliation is, when penitents are publicly presented before the entrance of the Church, and through imposition of the hands of the Bishop, are publicly reconciled to the Church. Whence towards the end of the Canon, they are not simply forbidden to reconcile penitents, but only ‘at the public mass.’ But private reconciliation is, when those who repent of secret sins, or lie in extremis, approach to the grace of reconciliation. This reconciliation may take place through the Priest.”

The sins which were the object of the public course of penance were very exceeding sins, for which penance was mostly allowed but once, and for which persons were excommunicated; and then mostly when they were publicly known. Tourneley admits, “By no Ecclesiastical law was there imposed a necessity of publicly declaring secret sins⁴.”

² De Pœnit. ix. c. 32.

³ C. 26. q. 6. c. 3.

⁴ De Pœnit. q. 6. Art. 4. p. 450.

The office of Penitentiarius, which was abolished by Nectarius, belonged, it is thought, to the Greek Church only; and lasted about 120 years only⁵. It related (as Roman Catholics even contend) only to the public penitence.

What Mr. Allies says, then, as to the power of absolution being exercised only "for many hundred years by the Bishop and priests living in common with him," relates only to the public penitence. Nothing whatever follows from it as to any private confession. The very statement implies that there must have been a very different discipline.

The Bishop and the priests living in common with him, could not locally have heard confessions frequently throughout the diocese. Either then persons must have unburdened their consciences to neighbouring priests, or at very rare intervals, or not at all. But in whatever degree confession was used apart from the public penitence, the very fact that priests were so markedly forbidden to restore penitents in the public office, and in that only, implies that in other respects they were (as Morinus infers) free.

To mention two passages. In the East, both Origen and St. Basil imply that there was that freedom. Origen, after exhorting to confession, says, "Only⁶ look diligently to whom thou oughtest to confess thy sin; prove first the physician to whom thou shouldest set forth the cause of thy sickness, who knoweth how to be weak with the weak, to weep with the weeping, who knoweth the discipline of sympathy and compassion, that so, if he who shall first have shown himself both a skilful and merciful physician, shall advise thee, thou mayst do it." One, then, who had a burden of sin, might choose what priest he willed, to whom to open his griefs, and at his advice enter upon the public course of penitence or no.

St. Basil puts the question, "He⁷ who willeth to confess (ἱξομολογήσασθαι, the public confession,) his sins, ought he to confess his sins at all, or to any, or to whom?" The question is inconceivable, had the system been as rigidly regulated as the statement presupposes. The answer is quite general, "It is necessary to confess the sins to those who are entrusted with the oracles of God."

And in another place in the same work,

"Ought⁸ forbidden actions to be told, without shame, to all, or to some; and to what sort of persons?"

"Ans. The discovering of sins has the same rules as the making known of bodily ailments. As then men do not reveal the ailments of the body to all, but to those skilled in their cure, so also the discovery of sins ought to be made to those able to cure them, as it is written, 'Ye that are strong, bear the infirmities of the weak,' i. e. by care remove them."

⁷ Reg. brev. Tract. q. 288.

Far more remarkable than any such passages is the entire omission of the mention of private confession, or of any rule about it, or any restriction whatever as to making or receiving it. Had the present Latin discipline been that of the Ancient Church, it is impossible that we should have no traces of it, no indication whatever of these rules, of which, since the Council of Lateran, there is such frequent mention. In the Latin Church there is distinct evidence, in times later than these, that the penitent had choice of his confessor. The date of the "De vera et falsa Pœnitentia" (which for a long time was supposed to be St. Augustine's) is, I believe, uncertain. It is some time later than St. Augustine⁹, whom it quotes and imitates. It says¹:—

"Whoso wishes to confess his sins, that he may find grace, let him seek a priest who knoweth how to bind and loose; lest if he be negligent about himself, he be neglected by Him Who mercifully admonisheth him, and desireth that both should not fall into the ditch which he in his folly would not avoid."

So entirely was the choice left to the penitent, that he could even abuse it to his own hurt, by choosing for himself one unfit to judge of his case.

A further abuse is mentioned in the same book, which, among other things, may have led to a stricter system. The abuse was, to make half confessions to two different priests, in order to escape the shame of showing the full sinfulness to one. "Be² the penitent careful, lest through shame he divide his confession in his own mind, so as to purpose to lay open different things to different priests. For some conceal from one what they reserve to be laid open to another; which is to praise himself and to tend to hypocrisy, and ever to miss the pardon which a person hopeth to obtain whole, by piecemeal." The statement and the practice both imply an unrestrained access to priests, for the purpose of confession, at the option of the penitent.

This treatise enjoyed great authority in the Western Church. It is quoted largely in the Decretals as St. Augustine's, and had both the weight of the great father to whom it was attributed, and of the Decretals, which also stamped that authority upon it. Even in the limitation which Gratian puts upon the words, "let him seek a priest who knoweth," &c., which are inserted in the Decretals, he allows, (1.) that any prohibitions of the later Canon relate only to cases of contempt for a person's own priest; (2.) that a person is free, if the priest to whom any would naturally go, be plainly deficient in the qualities required for the office ; if he be not skilled in the cure of souls.

Gratian's words are : " In that it is said that the penitent should choose a priest who knoweth how to bind and loose, it seemeth to be contrary to what is found in the Canons, that no one should presume to judge the parishioner (parochianus) of another. But it is one thing, out of favour and hatred to despise his own priest [proprium sacerdotem], which is forbidden by the sacred Canons ; another, to avoid one blind, which by this authority each is admonished to do, lest ' if the blind should lead the blind, both should fall into the ditch³.' "

There is in the treatise itself no such limitation as that in the later Canon, by which Gratian restricts the words " let him seek a priest," &c. ; and on this ground Navarrus thinks that he restricts them unduly. But the only limitation which he puts is, that a person leave not his own priest out of partiality or dislike, but for his insufficiency. Partiality or dislike would at all times be bad tempers for a penitent ; but the elder Church left more scope for the varying and sensitive minds even of penitents, and for that instinctive feeling which gives us confidence that one priest will understand the case of our soul better than another.

There is, however, a still more explicit passage quoted from the same work, in which the writer says, "Whoso⁴ then confesses at all, let him confess to the best priest that he can. If it be a hidden sin, let it suffice to refer it to the knowledge of the priest, that the 'offering of his gift' may be acceptable."

There is absolutely no plausible escape from this passage. Navarrus⁵, an eminent Spanish divine and Canonist, of the time of the Council of Trent, after examining different explanations, rejects them as insufficient. It will illustrate the clearness of the text to observe the ways in which it is attempted to get rid of it.

The gloss says, it was (1.) where there were several priests. Navarrus answers, there are few of those in comparison; but that "those are very rare indeed (rarissimæ) in which there is a college of priests without a head, and the care of souls is with each of them," mostly, "the care of souls is with one of them."

Or, (2.) "that confession should be made to a second priest, if the first was ignorant." Of this, too, Navarrus says it is too rare to be provided for, and appeals to experience that few, when confession has been lawfully made, repeat it.

(3.) He adduces the case of the Franciscans, Dominicans, &c. who had the privilege of receiving confessions. But he answers, this writer is older than the provision by which those orders had that privilege.

⁴ § 25, 26, quoted in Decr. de Pœnit. d. 6. c. 1.

⁵ Azpilcueta. He died at Rome, A.D. 1586. "He was the oracle of Rome, and the whole Christian world." Dict. Hist.

(4.) He says that it may mean, (1.) that whoso may choose a confessor, may choose the best he can, in whatsoever way that power come to him, whether by common law, or by any peculiar law; or (2.) that the parish priest should gladly give him that power, if he ask; and that, either because through his own ignorance he ought to do so, or although he be not bound, yet of his own accord he should do so willingly.

This falls plainly short of the broad words of the writer, thus adopted in the Canon law, “qui ergo omnino confitetur, sacerdoti meliori quam potest confiteatur.” The words plainly never would have been written thus, had the modern system then prevailed. So that Navarrus sums up, “There is no contradiction that in the time of Augustine, it was not as yet forbidden to hear [in confession] the parishioners of others, but in the time of Urban it was.”

Navarrus fixes the date of Urban II., because of the words of the decree on this subject, to which, in the Decretals, his name is twice prefixed. The recent editor thinks that Gratian mistook in affixing his name to it, because in a collection of Councils by Anselm, Bishop of Lucca, A.D. 1071—1086, it is ascribed to a Concilium Hybernense. To this question it is of no moment⁶. Whether it was a decree of Pope Urban II., or of an unknown Council, it was received into the Decretals, and became part of the Canon law about A.D. 1151.

⁶ Later Canons are inserted in the collection of Anselm; so

Navarrus' argument holds in any case, that this law implies a change in the existing rules of the Church. The decree is,—

“It is decreed, that henceforth no priest shall be allowed to receive to repentance any one committed to another priest, without the consent of him to whom he first committed himself, except through the ignorance of him to whom the penitent first confessed. But whoso shall presume to act against these statutes, shall be in peril of losing his rank.”

On this Navarrus argues, “Observe⁷ first from this text that it was allowed to any Christian before Urban II. to choose any priest. For this word ‘henceforth’ and the like, denote that the constitutions in which they are placed do not comprise the past, as is stated in the gloss joined to the Preface to the Clementines.”

Navarrus himself alleges as an objection to this, that there are decrees attributed to Calixtus (A.D. 221) and Dionysius (A.D. 259), which prohibit the like interference: “We have given distinct Churches to each Presbyter, and we have divided the parishes and the cemeteries, and have appointed that no one that this Canon, being now found in that collection, is no proof that it was anterior to Urban II. In the Decretals it is twice cited as Urban's, C. 9. q. 2. c. 2. and De Pœnit. dist. 6. c. 3.

⁷ In c. Placuit. de Pœnit. dist. 6. n. 1, sqq.

invade the bounds or right of another parish, but each be content with his own bounds.”

Both these passages are from the forged Decretals⁸. The former relates to Bishops only, and external jurisdiction; that of Dionysius is a mere forgery. Navarrus then rightly says that those decrees were not then received, for they were not in being.

“I see no other sense which truly accords with the passage [‘let him choose a priest who knoweth, &c.’], than that in the time of Augustine, half way between Dionysius and Calixtus on the one side, and Urban II. on the other, it was still lawful to choose a confessor, according to the simple laws of the Gospel, the statutes of Calixtus and Dionysius not being then received.” Suarez⁹, who says that he alleges this without proof, brings no proof himself on the other side; and builds upon the forged Decretals¹.

“It is,” he says again², “the common doctrine that any Presbyter of the Primitive Church could absolve any Christian which our text proves, weighing the word ‘henceforth.’”

But further, the very decretal itself only puts one slight restraint upon the choice, and allows the choice to be once made, but prohibits fickleness. Its words are, sine ejus consensu, cui prius se com- misit, “without his consent to whom he first committed himself,” it prohibits, then, a person withdrawing himself from one to whom he had previously committed himself, which might probably arise from fickleness, impenitence, wilfulness, or some other moral fault. But it shows by its very prohibition, that it was at his own option to whom to “commit himself.”

Alex. Alensis gives it as one solution: “It³ is understood of a man who has his own freedom, before he committed himself to any Priest; for it is expedient for such an one to choose the most prudent and best that he can.”

Coninck insists on the expression in the like way: “It is not said that he cannot confess to another without his permission to whom he was committed by superiors, or who has given him as his Parish Priest,—but without his permission to whom he committed himself, or whom he went of his own accord for the sake of confession.”

Dom. Soto⁴ rightly corrects the gloss on this Decretal, which explains away these words. “The gloss which says ‘committed himself,’ i. e. because he is his parishioner, perverts the sense.” This is plain. The Decretal speaks of a voluntary and unrestricted act, “he committed himself.” Soto’s own explanation is: “It provides against the ambition of priests, that after one has given himself up to one, although he have the privilege of choosing another, no other may receive him, except for the ignorance of the former; for then he may freely pass to another." But it is plain that had there been then this restriction, it would have been expressed: Soto says again, that some supply "having obtained the licence of a superior." This too he rejects, and says: "As far as may be conjectured from the words of the text, the public penitence is there spoken of, of which, when imposed by one priest, the penitent sought to be relieved by another. As now also, indolent penitents are wont to do as to secret penitences."

Suarez adopts the interpretation of Soto, and, like him, dwells on the expression "committed himself," as proving the act to be voluntary. "I weigh the reciprocal pronoun 'himself;' for it is clear from this that it does not speak simply of the commission given to the pastors of the Church by the division of jurisdictions, but of that commission and subjection whereby the penitent in act places himself under a Priest, with the will of confessing to him."

Gregory de Valentia, in turn⁵, rejects the explanation of Soto as unsatisfactory. "Sotus does not grant this as to the Parish Priests, divining something, I know not what, about the text of that Urban, against the interpretation of the gloss, and speaking in a perplexed way about that Canon, as also does Melchior Canus (Rel. de Pœnit. 5-6)

whereas the text of that Canon of Urban plainly speaks generally of a Priest to whom a person was committed [and had ‘committed himself’], that if he be ignorant, it is lawful for him to confess to another.”

Vasquez⁶ also remarks on Soto’s gloss, “It is unsatisfactory; for it is to divine an interpretation of the text, whereas it speaks plainly of this sacrament of penance; for the Pontiff (Urban II.) only intended to distinguish the jurisdiction of parishes, as appears plainly from the text.” He says also that the permission to leave the former priest and choose a new one, on account of the ignorance of the former, was manifestly not recalled; that, in forbidding to go to another priest without licence, it did not recall the positive law, which allowed it in the one case of ignorance.

Each of these remarks on the weak point of the others; the one party omits all notice that the original act of the penitent is represented as voluntary, “committed himself;” the other brings in the subject of “public penitence,” of which there is not one word in the Decretal. Its simple words, “It hath seemed good that henceforth,”—“he to whom he committed himself,” do not admit the glosses that the same was forbidden before, or that the person spoken of could not freely commit himself. Such glosses only show the more the difference between the time of Urban II. and of the writers.

The exception, again, made in this Decretal, in the case of the incompetency or ignorance of the priest to whom he had committed himself, agrees with the direction in the other, to "select the best priest any one could." There is no restriction as to this; and, however it may have been subsequently limited by the direction of the Lateran Council, that "those who for a just cause wished to confess to any other than their 'own priest,' should first ask and obtain leave of their own priest," this decree leaves it free. The gloss on the decree, although much subsequent, allows this. "So then⁷ for his ignorance, one might, on the authority of this canon, go to another, without licence of man, i.e. of that unskilled presbyter. It suffices that this be allowed by the law (Arg. ff. de Condi. Inst. qui sub § ult.). But is that strange priest to believe the simple word of that penitent who says that his priest is unskilled? Yes. For it is not likely that he would come with a lie to penitence. C. i. q. 7. c. 26."

On this Navarrus says: "From⁸ the first part of the gloss it is inferred, that any one may confess without the leave of the parish priest, when he is ignorant. For which conclusion this text seems irrefragable. For it is said therein, that no priest may hear the confession of the parishioner of another without the consent of his own parish priest, except on account of his ignorance. Then, when he is ignorant, his consent is not necessary. The preceding section favours this, in which Gratian says, that the parishioner may choose a confessor for himself, whom he wills, when the Parish Priest is blind or ignorant.” —“It rests the power of hearing the confession, not upon the asking or obtaining leave, but solely upon the ignorance of the priest.”—“It does not imply that the leave is either to be obtained or asked, when the parish priest is quitted for his ignorance.”

He explains the difference between this Decretal and that of the Lateran Council, by the different discipline which prevailed at each. “At⁹ the time of this chapter (A.D. 1087-99) it was not necessary that leave should be asked or obtained, when the Parish Priest was passed over for ignorance or any cause derived from his own fault.” He thinks also that the case is the same as to any other cause grounded on the fault of the priest, whether he revealed the confession or incited the penitent to evil.

Again, Medina¹ says, “In that it says, ‘henceforth,’ it plainly signifies that before that time, penitents used, for many causes, to leave their own curates, [the Canon says, ‘him to whom he committed himself’] and go to others.” “All which causes,” he says, “the text itself excludes, and admits that of ignorance alone, and accordingly the gloss there does not with reason extend the decree to any other just cause."

Medina, however, himself admits that there is a good deal of probability that in all such cases of moral unfitness in the priest, the penitent remained free. "By parity of reason," says Gabr. Biel², following De Palude, "when the Priest with cure of souls have any of these defects, the parishioners may confess without his leave, since these are no less defects than ignorance or indiscretion." "If he may be rejected for ignorance," says Richard de Media Villa³, "much more may he be for an evil will." "Ignorance" was probably used as a large term for unfitness. Whence we find the quality expressed by "ignorant⁴ and indiscreet," or simply "indiscreet⁵." The gloss says broadly, "either because he will not assign penance, or for any other just cause." And Antoninus⁶, "Under this case is comprehended, when the priest himself soliciteth to evil, or reveals confessions⁷, or is such, that danger would impend either upon the confessing or the confessor. In this case, then, Hostiensis says, that "by the very fact he has leave to go to another priest."

It is right, however painful, to say that the books put, under this head, dreadful cases of sin, in which, if there be peril to the party confessing^s, she is exempted from it. Medina gives it as a probable opinion that a person may go away from the Parish Priest, of whom there is a probable presumption, that he will solicit the person confessing to evil, or does not know the questions necessary to be asked, or cannot give wholesome counsel to the party confessing. "For then, although he is not absolutely without means of confessing, yet he has not means of confessing healthfully, if there be probable apprehension, that he will receive a confession, and that to the notable harm of those confessing." "In these and the like cases," says Medina, "it is probable that the penitent can go freely to whom he will, and [even after the Council of Lateran] it will suffice that he will hear of the curate, although he do not obtain it." And in this Antoninus follows him on the ground, that "though he be unworthy to hear, he is not without power to commit [the authority to others]."

In this case, there were the two opinions, the one that of Aquinas and Medina, that the penitent might confess to God only within; the other, that of Richard and others, that "if the priest maliciously refuse it, she may confess to another priest." The whole question implies a freedom of choice still remaining⁹. Some held that it was necessary in such case to apply to the Bishop, if access to him was easy; others deny this, since it is not specified in the law; in any case, if access was not easy, recourse, it was held, need not be had to him.

^s This occurs in different forms in different writers. Richard and Medina put the question as to "mulier quæ cum suo curato fornicata est." Medina and others mention "solicitor mulierum."

As private confession increased, it was, naturally, more systematized. It is natural that persons should have one confessor. One who knows the whole heart in the past, as well as in the present, can counsel best for the soul. It is natural that the Parish Priest should be that person, if otherwise qualified. It is best, also, that he who has ordinarily to minister to the soul, should know its wants to which he has to minister. "The shepherd¹," say the schoolmen, "should know the face of his sheep." When, also, confession became matter of discipline, not the result of God's working in the conscience only, it was the more necessary to guard against any evasion. It would not ordinarily be for a good motive that persons withdrew themselves from those who had the pastoral charge over them. Except for some special circumstances, it would imply some defect in the shepherd or the sheep.

⁹ There is a further class of cases, included less obviously in this head, where the penitent might fear the displeasure of the priest, as having offended him. Rich. l. c. ad 2. "If the parishioner had secretly contrived any thing against the person of the priest, of which machination he could be absolved by that priest, he would not be bound to confess it to him, lest he should be provoked to hatred."

It was, doubtless, a wise regulation, when the confession was made compulsory, that it should be made to a definite person. The question raised is not as to its expediency in a given case, but whether it be essential to the grace of Absolution. Mr. Allies assumes that it was the exclusive practice of the Church for fifteen centuries. I think, from this, we must deduct nearly eleven, the date of Pope Urban II. Indeed, the decree of Urban II. (if it be his) implies, as we have just seen, a greater freedom of choice, still remaining.

I know of little further evidence before the Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215. There are some Provincial regulations made as to the case of those who fell privately into the same grievous offences, for which, if they became notorious, a course of public penance was enjoined. But these were both local, and a part of the more formal discipline of the Church, still kept in the Bishop's hands. It belongs to the relation of Presbyters to the Bishop, not among themselves. It relates to a class of sins of which the discipline was, in some instances, kept in the Bishop's own hands, in others, given up to the Presbyters. It belongs to the external Court, not to the internal.

Thus it is provided by the Council of Ticino, Can. 6: "The Archpresbyters of the people must find out and exhort, one by one, every father of a family, that both themselves and all who dwell in their houses, who have publicly perpetrated crimes, should publicly repent.

"But they who have offended secretly, let them confess to those whom the Bishops and Archpresbyters of the people have chosen to be physicians of the more secret wounds of minds."

And in the Capitula of Herard, Archbishop of Tours, A.D. 855: "Let ² Presbyters reconcile penitents for secret sins, at the command of the Bishop, and, as we premised above, absolve and communicate the sick."

The latter clause relates to the excommunicated who were restored to communion on their death-bed, as it is expressed in the rule to which it refers: "That³ those who lie sick be reconciled without delay," and so in like way does the first relate to those who, for grievous sin, were placed under a course of private penitence, at the discretion of the Bishop. The excommunicate could only be restored by the Bishop, or in his name.

² Capp. c. 59. in Capitular. Baluz. p. 1291, quoted C. 26. q. 9. c. 4. from the forged Decretals as Evaristus Papa, A.D. 112.

³ Cap. 21. comp. Capitular. l. 34. "Of those who are in peril, and who turn to God, that they be inquired of according to the Canons as to reconciliation, and be reconciled according to the Canons."

On the other hand, Ratherius, Bishop of Verona, A.D. 928, speaks of secret sins as left to the presbyters altogether. He writes to his presbyters: "Know⁴ that for secret sins ye can assign penitence; acknowledge that for public, ye must refer to me." He forbids them to celebrate mass⁵ in another parish "without the wish and request of the Parish Priest, if present," but there is no other limitation as to confession.

Of other restrictions I know only of a Capitular⁶ of Ahyto, Bishop of Basle, requiring those who go to Rome to confess their sins at home before they go, "because they are to be bound or loosed by their own Bishop or Priest, not by a foreigner." He died A.D. 836.⁷

It would be a great temptation to deception, for persons to confess at a distance where they were unknown.

In the Decretals, there are among the Paleæ (and so perhaps held to be of secondary authority) two rules from the Council of Nantes II.⁸ (placed about A.D. 896), which forbid to admit to communion the parishioner of another who despises his own priest. They are then of much the same character as our Canon 57, which forbids "to refuse Sacraments at the hands of unpreaching Ministers," or to leave their own parish Church on that respect.

1. "On⁹ Lord's days and festivals, let the presbyters before they celebrate mass, ask the people, whether the parishioner of another be in the Church, who, despising his own presbyter, wisheth to hear mass there. If they find him, let them forthwith cast him out of the Church, and compel him to return to his own parish."

2. "Let no presbyter or deacon venture to receive to mass the parishioner of another, unless he be on a journey or have a suit there."

But on the subject of confession, I see in the Decretals, no further restriction than one in the 12th century, relating to the relaxation of public penitence by the Bishops to those who did religious or civil works for the good of others.

It occurs in a letter, ascribed to Alexander III., to the Archbishop of Canterbury¹, A.D. 1172.

"In that thou hast consulted me, whether remissions which are given at the dedications of churches, or to those who contribute to the building of bridges, benefit others than those who are under the persons remitting; we wish you, brother, to hold this, that since none can be bound or absolved by any but his own judge, we think that the remissions aforesaid only benefit those, to whom their own judges specially indulged them, that they might benefit them."

Bishops only had the power to give those relaxations; and there is evidence that they were given by Bishops for their own Dioceses.

Goffridus, in language corresponding to this letter², says, "Bishops and Archbishops can make general remissions (for instance in the building of bridges, and at the dedications of Churches,) which benefit those alone who are subject to the Bishops making them."

Navarrus, who puts diligently together whatever hints there are, finds no other rules, but only certain principles bearing upon the subject of non-interference.

Such are the rules which I before mentioned, of "not transgressing the land-marks set," or "thrusting a sickle into another's harvest," although not applied in the Decretals to this case.

In our own Church, I find no notice of any restriction, either in the canons of Theodore or any of our Anglo-Saxon Canons, nor indeed until the time which Mr. Allies points out, after the Council of Lateran. And the very fact of Episcopal restrictions taking place then, and not before, seems to show that they were the result of that Council, whose rule they carried out. Thomassin quotes a Council of York, A.D.

1194³, which mentions a general confessor for the Diocese, who, in the absence of the Bishop, might relieve from excommunication. But this, like the instances already cited, relates to the public penitence for notorious sins. The first mention of special confessors for the clergy is in Episcopal Constitutions, A.D. 1217, i. e. two years after the Council of Lateran. After this, he instances several Councils which make regulations as to this: Oxford, 1222, Lambeth, 1281, Exeter, 1287. In France, the earliest authority quoted is the Council of Paris, A.D. 1212.

This omission of the restriction before the Council of Lateran and its mention afterwards, is further illustrated by comparing P. Lombard, who died A.D. 1164, about fifty years before the Council of Lateran, with the Schoolmen who wrote after that Council. P. Lombard is said to have compiled his book from older sources. He has a chapter on the subject, "When⁴ are these keys given, and to whom?" He answers, "These keys are given through the ministry of the Bishop to any one, in the promotion to the priesthood. For when one receiveth the priestly order, he receiveth therewith these keys also." He then refutes those who say that "the power of binding and loosing is given to those priests alone, who are of exemplary life and doctrine," and maintains that "this key of binding and loosing is given to all priests, but that they only have it rightly and worthily, who preserve Apostolic life and doctrine. For that God giveth His blessing to him who asketh worthily, even through an unworthy minister." And he quotes as St. Jerome's the words of Rabanus Maurus on St. Matt. xvi. 28. "The other Apostles have the same judicial authority [as St. Peter]. The whole Church has it now in the Bishops and Presbyters." And he gives no hint as to any limitation on the use of this power.

The Schoolmen, on the other hand, who wrote after the Council of Lateran, invariably speak of the Proprius Sacerdos, and that, in commenting on P. Lombard, who makes no mention of it. The first is Alexander Alensis, our own countryman, who wrote about fifteen years after that Council. Yet it is remarkable that he treats it entirely as a regulation of the Church, a matter of good order.

He says, "there⁵ ought to be order." "To every man there is committed his own portion, according to the distribution fitting, and this is called his harvest. And because no priest may put his sickle into another's harvest, therefore one hath not this power of absolving the subject of another; and no one hath the power to absolve another's subject, unless he be the superior, or act for the superior, as the Penitentiary of Bishops, or legate, or one privileged, who can do these things by the authority of the superior. Yet this is to be understood according to the common law. But the law of charity and the righteousness of justice permits that, in a time of necessity, any one may absolve any one, if he be in the unity of the Church."

Again; "it hath pleased the Church, not that every priest should have power and the use of the power over every one, but rather over those subject to him, and that they who have no subjects, have the power, but not the use thereof. That therefore every one may know to whom he entrusts sacred things⁶, it is expedient that he know the face of his flock; lest holy things should be committed to unworthy persons, if each presbyter had power over each person, so then, according as the times are changed, the priestly rights are changed with the priesthood."

The Council of Lateran itself enacts the necessity of confessing to a person's own priest, only as a positive law, and is so quoted by Aquinas.

The foundation upon which Aquinas builds, is the practice of the Western Church, as recently prescribed and made binding by the Council of Lateran.

In his supplement to his "Summa⁷," this is plainly his ground. His very object is to maintain the rule of the Council of Lateran, that a man ought to "confess to his own Priest." He brings forward as objections, authorities which went under the ancient names of St. Gregory and St. Augustine, the evils which might ensue from such limitations, the absence of limitation in the other priestly office of celebrating the Holy Eucharist, and the case of the Pope and prelates who had no "proprius sacerdos." To these he opposes as his ground the Lateran Council which commands, "let all of either sex confess once in the year to their own priest," and a rule founded on the Canons. "The same relation which the Bishop has to his Diocese, the priest has to his parish. But one Bishop may not exercise his office in the Diocese of another Bishop, according to the enactment of the Canons. Therefore one priest may not hear the parishioners of another."

⁶ "Facta" must be an error for "sancta."

The ground then upon which Aquinas rests, is the then positive law, not the abstract fitness of things, nor the absolute necessity of them. And this law he speaks of as Innocent's. He meets the arguments which he adduces with the single fact, that Innocent III. had enacted differently. "But against it, is the decree of Innocent, who instituted (instituit), that all of each sex should confess once in the year to their own priest." Moderns have contended that the only change made in the Council of Lateran, was, that it was then enacted for the first time, that all should confess once in the year. But Aquinas, who was born nine years after the Council, and who lectured on the Sentences before forty had elapsed, speaks of it distinctly in reference to this very point, as "a decree" and "institution of Innocent III."

In like way, in his work on the Sentences of P.

Lombard, he sets forth⁸ as objections to the limitation, that priests receive the power without any limitation; the analogy of physical keys which unlock all wards of the same kind, as all sins are the same obstacle to entering heaven: the analogy of the Old Testament priesthood, in which the priest might pronounce upon the leprosy of all lepers alike.

The ground which he alleges against these, is a maxim of Gratian, founded on the Lateran Council. "It⁹ is not lawful for any priest to absolve or bind the parishioner of another."

What Aquinas there says of jurisdiction proceeds on the positive law. He was living in a system in which all had been, by the recent Council of Lateran, not only subjected to a particular priest, but enjoined to confess to him once in the year. The unlimited exercise of the keys, then, which he opposes, could not have place, without contravening the direct law of the Church. A priest could not absolve one placed by the Church under another, without contravening the authority of the Church, to which, and to priests in it, our Lord Jesus Christ left power to forgive sins.

Again, in meeting an objection in detail, he speaks of this whole regulation as one of positive law. The objection is that it might, in some cases, be pernicious to confess to a person's "own priest." "What is instituted for charity, militateth not against charity, says Bernard; but confession, which is instituted for charity, would militate against charity, if a man were bound to confess to one priest. As, suppose if the sinner knows that his priest is a heretic, or enticer to evil, or frail, prone to the sin which one confesses to him, or there be probable ground to think that he is a revealer of confessions, or if the sin which a man has to confess, be against himself."

Aquinas answers:—

"In those cases, in which a penitent has probable ground to fear peril to himself or to the priest from the confession which he has to make to him, he ought to have recourse to a superior, and ask from him licence to confess to another. But if he cannot have the licence, the case must be judged of as that of his, who has not access to a priest; whence he ought rather to choose a layman to whom to confess. Nor in this is any precept of the Church transgressed. For the precepts of the positive law do not extend beyond the intention of the giver of the precept, and that intention is the end of the commandment, which is charity."

He here distinctly speaks of it, as "a precept of the Church," and "a positive law." But positive laws are not immutable.

Further, Aquinas speaks of jurisdiction, in relation to the power of the keys, as a limitation which might be anew extended.

"The power of the keys in itself extends to all; but that a priest cannot use the power of the keys, happens from this, that his power is specially limited to certain persons. Whence he who limited it, can extend it to whom he wills." This is all which is needed for the English Church. The power of limitation or extension rests with the Bishop. He is not bound to limit the use of the power of the keys. And if one Bishop may give the power of the keys without restriction within his own Diocese, much more may all the Bishops, in a national synod, agree, to allow all, priests or people, to have recourse to any, in whom they may most confide.

This way of regarding the Council of Lateran as a positive law is adopted by several of the writers of the later Roman Church. Thus Cardinal Caietan says, "It seemeth¹ to be commonly said that the power of order of itself would extend to those to be absolved, unless jurisdiction were limited by the Church. He answers, "To this it is said that all Priests were ordained not only Priests in common but Judges in common, in the Court of Penitence. This second sense is true, supposing the truth of what is said, that, before the distinction of parishes, &c., Priests received both powers; so that then they were both Priests in common and Judges in common; but since, they are ordained indeed as Priests in common, but become [persons'] own judges, by assigning to them people of their own. In like way, Almain says that "many doctors hold, (as Arma-chanus in the ninth book, Marcilius in the second, and Durandus also,)

"1. That by the Institution of Christ, any Priest may use the key towards any one submitted to him by a voluntary and secret submission. 2. That the Church may reasonably prevent any one from absolving any sinner, if he attempt it. And this on the ground that a person cannot be absolved from his sins, while actually committing another deadly sin; but that one who herein acts against the prohibition of the Church does commit a deadly sin. I will add the statement of Vazquez, who came after the Council of Trent, and admits that it is an open question among themselves, how it is prohibited. "All Catholics agree that at least considering the canon law and statutes, all have not this power, to give absolution, since by human law all are prohibited from administering this sacrament indifferently; but how this is to be understood, all Catholics do not agree." And, as I said, he himself corrects, on both sides, those who had gone before him.

But what is done by human law, may be undone by human law.

But this, as I have said, enters upon a question, which becomes one of words; for those who maintain that "jurisdiction" is given by Christ in ordination, mean that it is given, subject to limitation by the Church; and those who maintain that it is not, contend that it is not, only lest thereby it should seem that the Church has not the power to regulate this exercise of the priestly office.

Let me now sum up, again, what has been said under this head.

1. The proof that Priests were not to reconcile penitents, adduced by Mr. Allies, relates solely to the course of public penitence for the most grievous sins.

2. While there are Canons of Councils, general and provincial, forbidding other interference, there are no such Canons for the first 1200 years, restricting private confession, except where it would interfere with public discipline, or was a part of it.

3. It has been observed by writers on the Canons, that the marked limitation of the restriction in the Canons to the public penitence, shows that private penitence was left free.

4. Either there was little or no private confession, or it must have been mostly carried on without being subject to any regulations. It could not have been carried on by the Bishops, as Mr. Allies says.

5. I have given instances from Origen and St. Basil in the East, and in later times, in the West from the author of a work long had in chief estimation and received in the Decretals, who leave the choice entirely open to the penitent; and none can be produced on the other side.

6. The Pope, who first limited it in any way

(setting aside the forged Decretals), Urban II. A.D. 1087, expresses that this was a change in discipline.

7. Even this change left it free to a person to commit himself to a priest in the first instance, although it forbade his removing to another after he had so chosen. It bears witness, that it was the practice at that time for persons to “commit themselves” at their own choice for confession.

8. The Council of Lateran was understood, about the time, to make this restriction a matter of positive law. But any restrictions which the Church has power to make, it has power also to relax.

To this should be added the great amount of evidence arising from those many cases in which law, or the permission of the Pope, of the Bishop, of the Parish Priest, and Provincial Synod, custom, or the tacit permission of those having authority, were accounted sufficient to relax even the law of the Council of Lateran. Law, nor custom, nor the Pope, could dispense with any thing required by the law of God, and essential to the validity of absolution. Since then, in such various cases, whole classes of men, the highest and the lowest, laity or clergy, all Kings, all Priests, all who were strictly under no “Priest of their own,” and many a mountaineer and peasant, who were not allowed to confess to their Parish Priest, might, on this ground only, confess to whom they would, it would be clear that the Church of England dispensed with nothing essential, when she directed her Priests from the altar to bid all troubled in conscience to come to themselves, or whom else they chose. The Church of England has only made that compulsory upon her Priests, which Aquinas says, if they did not, they would bring damnation upon themselves; and instead of leaving them to judge in each particular case, whether they would give leave or no, has obliged them once for all to direct their people, who needed it, to come to themselves "or some other."

One expression, indeed, in the decree of the Lateran Council has been urged in proof that it is not enacting positive law, but declaring what must be, in the nature of the case itself. It says: "Let all the faithful of both sexes, as soon as they come to years of discretion, faithfully confess all their sins in private, at least once a year, to their own priest; but if any one for a just reason desire to confess his sins to a priest not his own, let him first ask and obtain leave from his own priest, since otherwise he cannot absolve or bind him." The emphasis has been placed upon the word "cannot," as though this were meant of a thing abstractedly impossible. It means only that he could not do what the Church forbade him. He could not bind whom he had no authority to bind. He could not loose; for both the Priest and the person confessing would so be acting in direct contravention of the law of the Church. But one acting in contumacy to the Church is no penitent; nor can the powers entrusted by the Church be savingly employed against the Church.

The same expression is used in the Synod of Bayeux, A. D. 1300 (Can. 108), "We² strictly enjoin all Parish Priests, Chaplains, and Perpetual Curates, to confess once a year to us or to our Penitentiary. Since they cannot [non possint] be absolved by a priest not their own, who hath not cure of souls, and a confession made to any other than his own prelate, is known to be of no value. Yet in case of necessity they shall have the power [poterunt] to confess to other lettered priests. Yet let them not for this, omit to come to us or to our Penitentiary, once in the year."

Now, "cannot" here, can mean only "cannot, so long as it was forbidden." For priests were allowed subsequently by custom to confess to whom they would. And custom (it was ruled), was of no avail against positive law. The priest was no longer "alienus" when the Church allowed him to act. The rule that the Clergy should confess to the Bishop or his Penitentiary, once in the year, was clearly one of discipline only, since the other confessions, when permitted, were valid. The limitation of the "lettered priest" explains the previous exclusion of priests without cure of souls, viz. for fear they might be ignorant.

I may add some principles, stated by Navarrus, which altogether accord with the provision of the English Church. "The³ return to the ancient law is ready and easy, as is plain from the c. ab exordio ⁴ and all which Felinus ⁵ heaps together. But by this custom, a return is made to the ancient state of the law. For before this chapter (C. 9. q. 2. c. 2.) as is signified by the word ‘henceforth,’ in it, and by other laws consonant to it, every one was allowed to choose his own confessor. So then a return to it ought to be easy. Lastly, every custom, which is not against the Divine law, whether that of nature, or of revelation, (if it be otherwise reasonable and prescript,) prevails against the law and takes it away, if opposite ⁶. But this custom is such; as is clear if we weigh particulars. For it is not against the Divine law, or the law of nature. Else it never could have been just. And yet, it was observed as just, by that most just time of the Apostles. Nor can it be denied to be reasonable, which the whole primitive Church observed. Lastly, by the enacted law [jure] any Bishop, or Superior, or Prelate, immediately subject to the Apostolic see, can choose for himself a confessor ⁷. Why then could not the same be brought in by custom? But if this very thing could be brought in by custom, why not that all Presbyters should do the same? And if this too, why not, that all men of one village or town? and consequently also, why not, that all Christians?”

With regard to the abstract principles stated by

Mr. Allies, they relate rather to the abstract question of jurisdiction than to its application. The point upon which they bear is, whether or no presbyters, or the second order of the ministry, have in themselves by their ordination, independently and completely, the power of hearing confessions, and absolving any penitents who come to them for that end. And this not as regulated, or capable of being regulated by the Church, but indefeasibly in themselves. This is the real question which is mooted by schoolmen and others, under the form “whether⁸ the Priest can use the key which he hath towards any one?” “Whether⁹ any Priest can absolve any one?”

The principles do not apply to the question, whether the Church, locally or generally, may, either tacitly or expressly, give or leave to Priests that power. Several of these principles have been incidentally considered already.

Perhaps it will be clearest to take them as they stand in his pamphlet. “The¹ lawful exercise of this power [of absolution] belongs to jurisdiction.” In other words one might say, “this power can only be rightly, or, as it is said, validly, exercised according to the laws of the Church.” It is not an arbitrary power to be exercised at the will of the Priest. As to this there is no question. The question is, What are the laws of the Church? "Lawful² authority" is all which is meant by jurisdiction.

"The power, in its own nature, stretches to the absolution of all [penitents], and therefore these words of our Lord, repeated by the Bishop in his person, are so indeterminate and universal; but the use of that power is limited according to the jurisdiction possessed by the Priest, and this must come by a further grant from his superior³."

This last statement belongs to the too limited view which Mr. Allies takes of the conveyance of jurisdiction. Jurisdiction is not conveyed by a distinct grant from a superior. In the "gift of cure of souls," as Mr. Allies says⁴, "are comprised all means necessary for their well-being, of which the hearing confessions and giving absolution is assuredly one. Consequently all Parish Priests may be said to have ordinary jurisdiction for this purpose over their own flock, but not over others."

The cure of those particular souls is given by the Bishop, and in it the authority to give them "the benefit of absolution" before Holy Communion, if they "open their griefs," or to "move them to special confession of sins, if the sick man feels his conscience troubled with any weighty matter;" and so "if he humbly and heartily desire it," to absolve him. This authority towards those particular souls is given him by the act which commits those souls to him. But the authority to absolve those who come to him, by virtue of the direction of the Church, comes from the law of the Church, which so directs them. This is possessed by them from the time of their ordination, if any, according to that law, come to them.

“A⁵ man is ordained a Priest by a Bishop, and from that time forth he is as much a Priest as any one can be, yet he can perform no priestly act involving spiritual jurisdiction, without cure of souls, delegated to him either permanently, or at least during the performance of that act.”

True; but according to the principles of the Church, the cure of that soul, which either by law, or by licence of man, or by custom⁶, is allowed to come to a given Priest, is, “during the performance of that act,” given to him by the law which so allows him.

“Neither⁷ has the latter [a Priest] authority to exercise the power of the keys over this or that person, unless he has legitimate jurisdiction, i. e. the office of a spiritual superior over him.”

But he has “legitimate jurisdiction,” if the law allow the others to come to him.

“Even⁸ the material key can only open its proper lock, nor can any active virtue take effect save on its proper matter. Now a person is made the proper matter of the power of order, by means of jurisdiction, and so no one can use the keys upon one over whom he has no jurisdiction."

These are Aquinas's words, wherewith he retorts an abstract argument from analogy, that "the⁹ physical key which opens one ward, opens all others of the same sort. But all sin, of any man whatever, is an obstacle of the same sort with respect to the entrance of the kingdom of heaven. If, then, a Priest can absolve one man by the key which he hath, he can any other."

Such analogies are of course inadequate even as illustrations. This applies only to the question of an inherent power, illimitable by the law of the Church or by the Bishop. But as relates to the "proper matter," it is held that a person becomes the "proper matter" whenever he, by any means, may "lawfully go to any Priest."

"For¹ absolution from sin after sacramental confession a twofold power is required, the power of order and the power of jurisdiction. The first is equally in all Priests, but not the second, which descends from superiors to inferiors, and must be used according to the limitation imposed by the superior." To show that we are bound by limitations, if imposed, is not to show that Bishops are bound to make those limitations.

Aquinas uses this statement that "jurisdiction descends from superiors to inferiors," in order to show that "a superior may reserve some things to himself wherein he should not commit the judgment to an inferior." Such are, 1. "when the solemn course of penitence is to be imposed, of which the Bishop is the proper minister;" 2. As to the excommunicate, whom an inferior Priest cannot absolve; 3. An irregularity which requires the dispensation of a superior; 4. Incendiaries; 5. "When it is the custom in any Bishopric that enormous sins are, ad terrorem, reserved for the Bishop; for custom gives or takes away power in these." All this, then, belongs to "positive law," and is changeable.

Both "orders" and authority come from the superior. "Order" is given directly in ordination: authority to use it, or jurisdiction, although it comes ultimately from the superior, i. e. the Bishop, may come indirectly (as said so often above), either by law or by custom, &c. Conditionally, authority is held to be given in "orders" itself, i. e. authority to absolve penitents, subject to the rules of the law.

"All absolution pronounced by a Priest over a person not spiritually subject to him, is utterly without force: and a person cannot make himself subject to another at his own will; for this power descends from above, and does not ascend from below."

This principle, that "a person cannot make himself subject to another at his own will," we have already ² seen, when stated thus broadly, not to be true.

We cannot withdraw ourselves from lawful jurisdiction, under which, by God's appointment, we are placed, in order to place ourselves under other. But then the fault is in withdrawing, and so denying that jurisdiction. If the Church places you under no jurisdiction, but bids the Parish Priest invite you to come to "him or some other," you can be guilty of no withdrawal from lawful authority, and so are not guilty of any thing wrong in seeking "some other" Priest, to unburthen your conscience to him.

I must again say that it seems to me a technical paradox that a person cannot subject himself to another, so as to confess his sins to him. Aquinas expressly refutes it. He puts it as an objection. "It³ seemeth that one cannot use the keys to his own superior. For the sacramental act requires its own matter. But the proper matter of the use of the keys, as was said, is one who is subject. Therefore in him who is not subject, the Priest cannot use the keys." He answers, "Although a Bishop whom a simple Priest absolves, is, in the abstract, superior to him, yet he is inferior to him, as far as he has subjected himself to him, as a sinner to a Priest." Again, in contrasting the "judgment of confession with that of the outward court, in which an inferior cannot excommunicate or absolve a superior," he says, "The outward judgment relates to man, but the judgment of confession is as to God, before Whom every one is made inferior, by the very fact that he sins." He cannot, as I said, withdraw himself from one to place himself under another; but if the law of the Church is not transgressed, what is there to hinder a sinner from submitting himself to one who has received of his Lord authority to absolve him?

The principles upon which the Pope is supposed to choose his confessor, as I pointed out⁴, illustrates this case. He can "submit himself" to whom he will, because he is under no restriction. Since the law does not subject him to any one, he, since he withdraws from none, may subject himself to whom he will. In like way, Bishops in the West may by law submit themselves. But there is no difference in principle whom the law allows to submit himself. He who receives him has his sanction from the law.

I have already considered the statement that "in⁵ default of either ordinary or delegated jurisdiction, a Priest cannot, by the mere power of order, hear confession and give absolution; and if he does so, his absolution will be null and void."

"Ordinary jurisdiction for hearing confessions and giving absolution" all Parish Priests have over their own flock. "Delegated jurisdiction" is, by the common rule of the Western Church, possessed by any Priest towards one whom the Church, and in it the Pope, Bishop, or Parish Priest, by law or by custom, tacitly or expressly, allowed not to confess to the Parish Priest. All our priests have delegated jurisdiction from the law of the Church towards all who “come to” them.

The letter varies in words only.

It has the same statements of the invalidity of “acts flowing from jurisdiction, if done upon those over whom the doer has no jurisdiction;” “the reason of which,” it says, “that jurisdiction being a relation of command between a superior and a subject, one who has no subject can have no jurisdiction, and accordingly cannot exercise a power which he has not received.”

As relates to the argument, the answer is the same as before, that every Priest has jurisdiction towards one who may lawfully go to him. The language of this statement is somewhat harsh, as Mr. Allies would feel, if it were applied to the Pope, or a Bishop, using confession to any simple Priest. It is true that, as Soto says, “The ⁶ Pope or Bishop has to obey him whom he has chosen as a confessor, just as the rest of Christians;” in other words, one who consults a physician of the soul has to obey that physician. But no penitent whatever (unless he fall under excommunication, which is distinct), comes under “a relation of command between a superior and a subject" in any other sense, than a Pope or a Patriarch. I notice this, because being a somewhat hard translation of scholastic language, it might tend to increase the prejudice against confession in the minds of those who know it not. Our chief office, as you know, is as fathers and as physicians. We would help to "bear one another's burdens." The world thinks of us as though we laid burdens upon those who come to us, instead of being the instruments of lightening them.

"The⁷ act of remitting sin upon confession is an act not only of order, but of jurisdiction. That it is an act of order nobody doubts, and therefore proof is needless. That it is, likewise, an act of jurisdiction, is proved by two considerations: first, it is a judicial power, and all judgment to be valid requires jurisdiction. And, secondly, it is not only a power of remitting, but also of binding; and none can bind one who is not his subject."

Excommunication, in the outward court is, strictly speaking, an act of judgment. The sentence is a judicial sentence. In private confession the "judgment" is subordinate, whence Aquinas calls it "a sort of judgment." Certainly, a Priest is bound to use judgment in discriminating the character and grievousness of offences, which the penitent often cannot estimate, but even inverts, sometimes unduly oppressed by lesser faults, and underrating the heavier, and not unfrequently mistaking his whole character, and not discerning wherein the root of his sinfulness lies. In difficult cases, the Priest has often to judge whether an act be or be not sin, or to what degree it was sin. He has also to declare the judgment of Almighty God against the offences which He condemns. And as to the individual himself, he must judge (as far as man can judge, and subject to His judgment Who seeth the heart,) whether one who thus seeks the benefit of absolution, have that temper of faith and repentance, and earnest purpose to forsake sin, in which alone he can receive absolution beneficially. It would be to profane the authority committed by Christ to His Church, to pronounce pardon in His Name on the impenitent—a pardon which would not be confirmed in heaven, and which would but aggravate the previous sin, and harden the heart. The power of judging is entrusted to us for the sake of those who come to us. But there is no ground why it should not be sufficient for a penitent voluntarily to submit himself to such judgment. He must, in truth, voluntarily submit himself, for, as has been said, “even if the Priest knew the sin of the penitent, he could have no power of acting towards him, as a judge, in the penitential court, unless the penitent himself voluntarily submitted himself.” The penitent does not give the authority to the Priest, but rather goes to him who has authority to absolve him in the Name of the Father, the Son, and Holy Ghost. And he has this authority, according to the principles of the Church, whom the Church in whatever way allows to exercise it.

As to the second statement, to "bind" in the court of outward discipline, is to place under the censures of the Church. The sinner is inwardly tied and bound already by the chain of his sins. He whom our Lord had recalled to life, but left to be loosed by those whom He bade to loose him, was bound already. To "bind," then, here, is rather to "leave bound." If the Priest is compelled not to absolve any one, or to put him off for a time, that he may come with true sorrow, he does not bind him faster,—he leaves him as he was. He comes to the Priest because he cannot otherwise go to Holy Communion "with a quiet conscience." The Priest, if for the time he dare not speak "peace, when there is" as yet "no peace," leaves him more hopeful than before. He does not bind him anew, but waits in order to unbind him more healthfully.

This power every Priest must have towards one who "opens his griefs" to him. He is not an automaton; he has an office of which he must give account; he must as little speak peace falsely, as make sad the heart of the righteous or the true penitent. On the other side, it is true that a person cannot "loose" one whom he is not entitled to loose. But when the Church gives a person freedom to go to whom he will, then the Priest is entitled to exercise that office of mercy in his Redeemer's Name freely.

The Church has power to give to all her Priests that same authority to absolve without limitation, which is given by a Bishop to a Vicar-general or Penitentiary⁸ over his whole diocese, or by the Pope to whole Orders. That "penitentiary" had not those whom Mr. Allies would call "his subjects." He had power to absolve, not this or that person, but all. But they were not in the first instance under his authority. They were not bound to come to him. He had authority to absolve them, but not, in the first instance, authority over them. Mr. Allies' statement is, that they were persons delegated by the Bishop to hear confessions, when the case might require it. He has no more jurisdiction or authority over them. He is simply entitled to receive and absolve them, lawfully coming to him. Every Priest has the same, to whom persons may come by the law of the Church.

"Every⁹ ecclesiastical act and function ought to be regulated by its Bishop either doing it immediately, or by means of others who receive from him their commission and authority to do it. And especially an act so principal in the government of souls as the absolving them from sins, cannot be regulated but by the Bishop, nor done but by authority emanating from him."

True it is, as St. Cyprian says, "Each prelate hath in the government of the Church', his own choice and will free, hereafter to give account of his conduct to the Lord. But the Bishops are equally free, for "the² harmonious concord" of the whole, to forego a portion of their own freedom. They may regulate this office in common, and once for all. It would be to restrain his power to exclude this particular sort of "regulation," that, considering the great difficulty in opening the conscience at all, Bishops should leave it entirely free to those with burdened consciences to seek whom they would.

Lastly, the letter instances, as a proof of this limitation, that "certain cases were reserved by the Bishop to himself." This shows that he has the power to keep the whole authority to himself; but it does not show that he has no power to delegate that authority to the presbyters indiscriminately, or that the Bishops collectively might not take away all restriction.

We have already seen³ that Archbishop Cranmer meant to suggest that such cases should no longer be "reserved." Of the cases instanced by Aquinas, excommunication only is reserved to the Bishop, as belonging to the outer court. As in those "reserved cases," the Bishops might or might not reserve them, and if they reserved them, the Priest would not be free, but would be free if they did not; so also as to the whole. The more entirely the jurisdiction lies in the Bishops, the more it follows that they might retain it wholly to themselves, or use it, associating presbyters with themselves, or delegate it to certain individuals, or give it (as is now common in the Eastern Church) to the monks¹, or confide it permanently to all Parish Priests within their own parishes, or give it without restriction to all. And as this ordinary power of using the keys within certain limits may, according to Mr. Allies, be given tacitly and ipso facto to all Parish Priests within their cures, so there is no principle to prevent the power of the keys being given to all Priests to be exercised by them at their own discretion.

All these abstract principles in common, as I said, are founded on a narrow view of jurisdiction, as if the necessary authority could only be given to Priests by direct delegation from the Bishop, either tacitly, with cure of souls, "over those particular souls," or expressly to certain Priests selected by themselves. On this narrow view followed a narrow interpretation of the invitation of the Church to those who could not quiet their consciences, which she requires every Priest to use, "let him come to me or to some other." This, according to the principles of the Church, before the Council of Trent, gives full liberty to any parishioner to go to whom he will, and to any Priest to receive him. It is a delegation by the law of the Church to all Priests to receive those who come to them for this office, to receive the benefit of absolution before Holy Communion.

There seems to me no possibility of flaw in this. Before the Council of Trent no licence was required; no leave from the Parish Priest or individual Bishop, when the law gave leave. But here the Bishops are included by the use of the Common Prayer Book, and the Parish Priest by the law of the Church, in obedience to which he uses the words and gives the leave.

It may, perhaps, be well just to mention the Service for the Sick, since there the Parish Priest is specifically mentioned. But it is to be observed that the Rubric imposes a duty upon the Priest, it does not restrain the Parishioner. In sickness, among other duties, the Priest is required to "move the sick man to" this. He is bidden to suggest it to him. The Parish Priest would mostly be the Priest by the sick man's side. But it is inconceivable that the Church of England, when she was removing the limitation, that persons shall, except with leave of the Parish Priest, confess once in the year to him, should, by a side wind, restrict that which the charity of the whole Church had ever left free⁵. It is contrary to all principles of interpretation to explain negatively what is decreed positively, and to infer that because the Church of England requires the Priest who visits the sick man to remind him of what may be for his soul's health, therefore she deprives the sick man of that freedom to choose to whom he would "open his griefs," which she had given him during his whole life. Besides this, the Church of England has provided a short but special service for the Communion of the Sick. The rule, then, as to the Holy Communion, equally comes in here. Confession, if used, would precede the Holy Communion. But before Holy Communion, the Church left him free to choose in life. Can any conceive that the Church would be less tender, if he wished it, in sickness or death, when she had been so tender all his life long? Impossible.

Yet there may remain this prejudice, Can this be the purpose of the Church of England, since it has been so neglected? How is it that Confession, although the fact is notorious, is not, as in the Church of Rome, used in open churches? Negligence of a law can never be an argument to explain away its plain meaning. This argument would go too far. It would go, not to the question which this letter raises, but to the use of Confession altogether. And yet the Church of England expressly commands each Parish Priest to "move each sick person to make a special confession of his sins, if he feel his conscience to be troubled with any weighty matter."

But, again, did the Church of England mean her children not to fast, when she set down days of fasting and abstinence, and required the Curate to give notice of them? or did she mean that the Holy Communion should in Cathedrals be celebrated once in the month, or in our Colleges once only in the term, when she directed, "In Cathedral and Collegiate Churches and Colleges, where there are many Priests and Deacons, they shall all receive the Communion with the Priest every Sunday at the least, except they have a reasonable cause to the contrary?"

Or did she mean that no children should be catechized in Church during the evening service, when she directs: "The Curate of every Parish shall diligently upon Sundays and Holy-days, after the second lesson at Evening Prayer, openly in the Church, instruct and examine so many children of his parish sent unto him, as he shall think convenient, in some part of this Catechism?"

I do not mean that the Church may not alter her rules, but that their non-observance is no proof that she never intended them to be in force.

Negligence has no prescription to be the interpreter of the Church's meaning, to be the guardian of her laws, to enforce their continued desuetude. It has no Divine right to reign undisturbed in the throne which it usurps. It cannot hold against the lawful possessor, tender Mercy who binds up every wounded heart that comes to her.

This revival of Confession is, as I said, the teaching of God through the Church. It is, in one way, a comfort that man did not teach it; for we are the more sure that it was the teaching of God. We taught repentance; God through the Church taught thousands of souls how to find healthful peace. All have felt, doubtless, how at one time more than at another, words of Holy Scripture spoke unto them out of the pages of their Bible, in a way in which they had never spoken before. You well recollect how St. Augustine was converted by the voice, "Take up, read;" and he read, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof." Even so, directions founded on Holy Scripture in our Prayer Book, which slept except here and there, while people led easy lives, awoke and spoke while their hearts were wounded.

But, like every revival, it is spoken against by those who value it not. And so, because it is so very sacred, it has been practised in silence. Who was to speak of the individuals who used it? Who speaks of his devotions? Who tells of his own silent tears before God, or the anguish of his heart, or the Divine consolations? Who would wish that one of the most sacred actions of his life, should be made the subject of the angry strife, the jest, the mockery of a profane and irreligious world? "What if some did not believe? shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect?" The religion of the English is especially retiring. We speak little of what we feel most deeply; we do not say, mostly, our private prayers in Churches, because we prefer "praying to our Father in secret." Why should we throw the Church doors open for this most sacred act between our own soul and God, for any chance wayfarer, whose heart God has not touched, to marvel at? When we have, by God's grace and blessing, Christianized the heathen population of our towns, it will be time to think of throwing open our Churches, that all may, as of old in the public penitence, weep with those who weep, and rejoice with those who, having been lost, are found. When among all, "as brethren and fellow-servants, there is one hope, one fear, one joy, one suffering, because there is One Spirit from One Lord and Father⁶;" when God shall have "made" us "of one mind in one house," it will be time to open the Church doors, because passers-by will pray with us, not gaze. Now, the Church appeals to her children individually. Each can alone know his own grief. No other can judge for us as to that which is known only to ourselves and God. We cannot ask advice, without laying open our griefs before-hand, i. e. making confession to one unauthorized to receive it, and not bound to hold it sacred. The Church, in a matter strictly of private conscience, appeals to us one by one: "If there be any of you, who by this means cannot quiet his own conscience herein, but requireth further comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned Minister of God's word, and open his grief." We, each of us alone, are to give account of ourselves before God. We each of us "know our own sore and our own grief."

The Prayer Book is the voice and teaching of the Church. It teaches with a voice unchanged. If an exhortation, which before her most solemn service the Church directs her ministers to use, is not the voice of the Church, what is or can be? It has spoken, it does speak, it will speak more and more, as hearts become more tender, more anxious to have every spot of sin removed, more sensitive of every thing displeasing to the eyes of the All-Holy God.

The remedy against any abuse will not be in the limitation of the office, but in the increased instruction of the Parish Priest. We have not, at present, generally the most difficult cases, because those who come to confession, come willingly with true repentance. It is a most precious part of the cure of souls, the feeding of the sheep and lambs of Christ. It is our Lord's own office, "to heal the broken-hearted, and set at liberty those that are bruised." It is to comfort the afflicted, to relieve the doubtful, to guide the perplexed, to strengthen the weak, to conduct along the narrow way, to teach how to conquer the besetting sin, to rekindle the still smoking flax, to guard against backsliding, or recover those who have gone backward to the ground, to ease the burthened conscience, to bring back the peace of God. These are God's works through His own Ordinance. We have seen it, heard it, felt it, handled it. We saw that it was "the Lord's doing, and it was marvellous in our eyes." In this is our comfort, our hope. He through the Church revived it; He enlarged it; He poured out His grace through it; He continued what He began. To Him be the glory, and thanksgiving, and praise, for ever and ever, as it will be through the souls whom He has saved.

May God enrich you in all things, and in this fruit also.

Ever your very affectionate friend,

IN VINDICATION

FREEDOM WHICH THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND LEAVES TO HER CHILDREN TO WHOM TO OPEN THEIR GRIEFS.

BY THE REV.

E. B. PUSEY, D.D.

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF HEBREW ; CANON OF CHRIST CHURCH ; LATE FELLOW OF ORIEL COLLEGE.

POSTSCRIPT.

It may, perhaps, tend to clear some points in the preceding letter, if I explain what has been misconceived by Mr. Maskell in his recent letter to myself. He does not object to the accuracy of any authority which I have adduced. He says, "I have read with pleasure your remarks on the subject of jurisdiction, ordinary and delegated," but thinks that what I have written is partly altogether irrelevant, partly does not prove what I had to prove¹.

My object was twofold; to answer, 1st, the direct question which was put to me, how I could justify a practice (common to me and many others with one, at least, of the writers) to receive confessions from persons who came to us, but whose souls were not directly entrusted to us by the Bishop, and, in my own case, without having any particular cure of souls at all; 2ndly, an implied question (at least in Mr. Allies' pamphlet, which I was also in part answering), "If this be so, is the Church of England justified in allowing it?"

The direct answer to the first of these questions is contained in p. 102—130 of my letter; but in the preliminary matter on jurisdiction, I made observations bearing chiefly upon the second, which Mr. Maskell treats apparently as irrelevant, because this was not the direct question put to me². I was applying principles, acknowledged in different cases in the Roman Church, to show that the jurisdiction insisted upon, could, without any violation of principle, be given in the English Church in the way commonly understood. In so doing, I was obliged to assume, for the time, the truth of what I purposed afterwards to prove. I meant this: "Taking for granted, for the present, that such is the English rule, it is borne out by these principles. There is no deviation from any principle, such as Mr. Allies implied, involved in the English practice." My receiving the confessions of those who applied to me, although not their Parish Priest, was censured as irregular. If I had simply maintained, this is allowed by the Church of England, the charge, I expected, would have been brought against the Church.

² e.g. I have said, p. 172, "If one Bishop may give the power of the Keys without restriction within his own diocese, much more may all the Bishops, in a National Synod, agree to allow all, priests or people, to have recourse to any, in whom they may most confide." Mr. Maskell says, p. 3, "Perhaps so; but the question still is, have the Bishops of the English Church agreed to give so large and unrestrained permission?" This was the question directly put to me, which I also answered; but the other seemed to me involved in the statement, and so I wished to answer it also. This was the object of my observations in p. 36. 38. 40. 48. 55. 56. 61. 65. 76.

I therefore met both charges together. A narrow, and so a false view of jurisdiction was laid down, both in Mr. Allies' letter, and in the joint letter which Mr. Maskell has now published. The writer stated throughout³ two sorts of jurisdiction only; the jurisdiction directly delegated to the Parish Priest, "over the particular souls" entrusted to him, and that delegated, equally directly, "over the whole or any portion of his flock as to a Vicar-general or penitentiary."

The only exception to this, which was allowed in Mr. Allies' pamphlet, was that of a person in articulo mortis. The fact of my not having cure of souls was added apparently ad invidiam. For the principle stated by Mr. Allies applied to any priest with cure of souls, who received the confessions of one who was not his parishioner.

Through some oversight, the letter only stated a portion of the theory of jurisdiction, contained in the very books whose words had been used, and omitted that portion which bears on the practice of the English Church, though contained in the next pages of the same books, such as Suarez.

This narrow statement was supported by the answer of Pope Eugenius IV. to the Armenians, which was quoted as the Council of Florence.

In order, then, to remove this objection, which was raised upon a defective statement of the theory of jurisdiction, I was compelled to enter at length into the whole question. The cases which I adduced did not all bear upon the point which was directly questioned in the joint letter; but they did all combine to show that the theory of jurisdiction was misstated⁴, in that it was limited to direct "authority" over the individual himself. They also showed that it was a matter of positive law, and therefore might be undone by positive law. The conclusion which they went to establish, was that briefly stated from Gregory de Valentia⁵. "It makes no difference whether any obtain jurisdiction from the law (jure), or from man (i. e. by the concession of the ordinary minister), or from custom, supposing he obtain it lawfully by any one or more of these ways, as appears from what is commonly disputed hereon by Doctors, especially John Medina, de Conf. qu. 31, and Soto, Dist. 18. qu. 4. Art. 2;" or Suarez⁶, "Standing upon the ancient law, by a general faculty given to choose a confessor, any Priest might be chosen, qualified by the Divine law, without any other condition, or approbation being required by human law. This is proved on the same ground, that no law can be pointed out wherein this is prescribed."

³ Mr. Allies has since informed me, that he had the other sort of "delegated jurisdiction" in his mind. I cannot find it in his pamphlet, nor in the joint letter now printed by Mr. Maskell.

⁴ This I pointed out, p. 30, 31.

⁵ Quoted p. 31. This includes the Pope, or the Bishop, or the Parish Priest.

⁶ Ib. p. 90.

In the letter written to me, it was conceded, that the words "or some other" gave free leave to any parishioner to go to another than the Parish Priest; only it was urged that it must be gathered from the common practice and discipline of that time who that "other" was; and it was assumed that he would "of necessity be a priest, who had been appointed by the Bishop for that diocese and district." It was allowed that the words "or some other" freed the parishioner, in this respect, from the "jurisdiction" of the Parish Priest; only it was contended that they did not convey jurisdiction to any other, but that the "other" must be a person "appointed by the Bishop for that diocese and district." The whole argument of the letter bore upon this one point. Mr. Allies (whose the letter was, with the exception of a few words interlined by Mr. Maskell, although countersigned by Mr. Dodsworth and Mr. Maskell) had already made the same statement, not as an inquiry, but dogmatically. He wrote of it to myself as "a conviction."

He laid down⁷,

"A Bishop has jurisdiction over his own diocese; he imparts a portion of that jurisdiction to every priest to whom he gives the cure of souls; and in that cure of souls are comprised all means necessary for their well-being, of which the hearing confessions and giving absolution is assuredly one. Consequently all Parish Priests may be said to have ordinary jurisdiction for this purpose over their own flock, but not over others.

“Again, a Bishop may delegate such power of using the Keys to any priest over any, or over all, persons in his diocese; for they being his own spiritual subjects, he can impart a portion of the pastoral care over them to any person duly qualified, i. e. by sacerdotal orders, whom he pleases.

“But in default of either ordinary or delegated jurisdiction, a priest cannot, by the mere power of Order, hear confession and give absolution; and if he does so, his absolution will be null and void.”

Again, in the letter now printed by Mr. Maskell. “What authority is there for supposing that the acts of a priest are valid, who hears confessions, and gives absolution, in mere virtue of his orders, without ordinary or delegated jurisdiction from his Bishop?”

“Such authority emanates from him [the Bishop] when he commits to any priest the cure of souls, thereby entrusting such an one with a part of his own ordinary jurisdiction, as regards such particular souls ⁸, for all purposes of the Christian ministry, and, among them, for absolution from sin in order to the due reception of the Lord’s Body and Blood.”

“Such authority, again, he can commit to any person qualified by sacerdotal orders, over the whole or any portion of his flock, as to a vicar-general, or a penitentiary, who would accordingly have a delegated jurisdiction."

As far as any hint is given, ordinary jurisdiction is defined to be jurisdiction over particular souls; delegated jurisdiction is jurisdiction given "over the whole or any portion of his flock." Both are direct only.

"But what we wish to know is, whether there be any authority for considering valid the absolution of a priest, who has neither received such ordinary jurisdiction in the cure of souls, nor such delegated jurisdiction: or, again, who, having the cure of souls, absolves not only his own parishioners, but others also, without license from their own parish priest or bishop." (p. 8. 10.) So then it is inquired, 1st, whether any Absolution by one not having cure of souls, is not invalid? 2ndly, whether that of one with cure of souls, who absolves others without leave from their Parish Priest or Bishop, is not so? Nothing is, therefore, said of the case, where leave is given by the Church.

"The office was never exercised save by direct commission from the Bishop, and, over the persons specially entrusted to the priest who absolved them." (p. 11.) This excludes the other sorts of "delegated jurisdiction."

"We have not overlooked the sentence in the exhortation appointed in the Common Prayer Book before Communion: 'Let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned minister of God's word, and open his grief,' &c. . . . But, after the best consideration in our power, we have come to the conclusion, that so far from weakening the difficulties which we have suggested, it strengthens their force.

"The words 'some other,' &c. would of course be intended to be understood only in the sense of the common practice and discipline of that time, 1548⁹, in this matter: and we believe there is not any doubt whatever what that practice and discipline were. So that the 'some other,' &c. would of necessity be a priest, who had been appointed by the Bishop, for that diocese and district." (p. 13.)

It is thus stated distinctly, that if a person, acting on the words of our exhortation, went to another priest, the "some other" must be some priest expressly appointed by the Bishop for that Diocese and district. Of this it was said, "we believe there is not any doubt whatever." Mr. Allies did not at that time know that priests were exempt from this supposed rule. The tenor of the whole letter was to imply that there was no other way in which a priest might lawfully hear confessions and give absolution, except by authority, given to him directly over the persons whose confessions he should receive.

It was to this point, then, that I was called upon to answer. This point Mr. Maskell now entirely concedes¹:—

“ I do not dispute your objection to our statement, that the ‘some other’ of the sentence so often quoted, ‘would of necessity be a priest who had been appointed by the Bishop, for that diocese or district.’ It was an incorrect because too limited an assertion; for if a parishioner might (legitime) lawfully submit himself to any priest, not his own Parish Priest, in confession, it certainly was not simply necessary, according to the then discipline, that such self-chosen confessor ‘should have been formally appointed by the Bishop.’ ”

This, then, I have shown, concedes the whole question as to “jurisdiction;” and in that Mr. Maskell proceeds to insist on the “qualifications” of the priest, he has not even noticed what I have alleged at some length² from Roman authorities since the Council of Trent, to show, that before that Council, it was not necessary that the priest should be “approved for that purpose.” Yet Mr. Maskell repeats,

“ It was necessary that he should be a priest, authorized to receive confessions and approved for that purpose; but, as I think you have shown, it was not, at that time, ‘of necessity that he should have been appointed by the Bishop, for that diocese or district.’ ” And he still treats this as matter of jurisdiction, not of qualification only.

But Mr. Maskell, having conceded the question before disputed by Mr. Allies, that it was not requisite "that the person should be appointed by the Bishop for that diocese or district," now disputes what was before conceded. It was conceded before, that the words "let him come to me or some other," gave leave (as seems self-evident) to go to "some other." It was only questioned, who that "other" was. Now it is questioned, whether any leave is given at all.

I had said³ (on the principles of the Western Church which had been appealed to), "Delegated jurisdiction includes, among others,

"1. All cases in which the law of the Church gives to persons, liberty to choose for themselves.

"2. All cases in which the Bishop or the Parish Priest himself gives leave to choose some other than the "Parish Priest." And in my summary of the case⁴,

"Together with this change, there occurs an invitation to those who cannot otherwise quiet their conscience, to unburthen it with a view to the benefit of Absolution. In this invitation, each Parish Priest is directed by the Church to say, 'Let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned minister of God's word,' thereby formally releasing them, by direction of the Church, from any necessity of coming to himself, and in broad absolute terms bidding them, if they desired it, to go to some other.

“3. Leave so given by the Parish Priest, was contemplated, before the Reformation, as amply sufficient to entitle the parishioners to go to any other priest, and to convey to that priest (whosoever he might be) jurisdiction to receive the confession, and absolve the penitent.”

Either of the two modes of conveying jurisdiction, by the “law” or “the leave of the Parish Priest,” are sufficient. In cases within the English Church, they are combined. The law of the Church of England requires each individual Priest to give that leave; she puts into his mouth, and requires him to use, the words which give it.

Mr. Maskell separates these two, as if they could not coincide. He seems to say, “If you argue on the ground that they are the voice of the Church, you cannot argue at the same time that they are the words of the individual priest; if you contend that they are the words of the individual priest, you cannot argue that they are the voice of the Church.” But since they are both in one, this is to separate what is inseparable. The priest does not speak the words on his own sole authority, but by the authority or direction of the Church. The Church does not pronounce in an abstract way, as by a Canon, but she incorporates her direction into an exhortation, which she puts into the mouth of the priest. Both act in one. And this every one must necessarily feel and know whenever the words are read. He does not hear the words as if they were those of a sermon, and so were the simple leave, or advice, or permission of the priest. The priest is not speaking his own words, but those which the Church puts into his mouth; and yet they are his words also, and he must go along with them; else he would reject the mind of the Church. Nor does he read them as a Canon or Article, declaring an abstract proposition, but he reads them, as the Church's exhortation to the people, and his own, as her minister, obeying her injunctions. And surely a Prayer Book, to which all the Clergy are required to express "their unfeigned assent and consent," and which is used exclusively in the whole worship of the Church, is the voice of the Church. It is so, far more than Canons or Articles.

Mr. Maskell says, p. 27, "If, on the other hand, you regard it as the voice of the Church, it is not perhaps necessary that the Priest should read it publicly; but, in this case, you have not produced one single authority in support of such an interpretation of the clause." I do not understand what this means. Mr. Maskell can surely hardly mean, that the Prayer Book is not the voice of the English Church. And I should have thought he could mean, as little, that the voice of the Church would not give authority to her Ministers. "Jus," or law, is an acknowledged source of authority. To the Universal Church it is the law of the Universal Church; to the Western, of the Western Church; to a Provincial Church, of that Church.

Mr. Allies' argument was, in substance, this. "The words 'or some other' must mean now what they meant in 1548, and in 1548 whatever they would have meant in 1500. In 1500, they would have meant 'a priest who had been appointed by the Bishop for that diocese or district.' Therefore they cannot now give authority to you, who have not been so appointed."

In my answer I made some observations to show that the relation of the parishioner to the Parish Priest was different, as to confession, when confession ceased to be compulsory.

I did not rest exclusively or chiefly (as Mr. Maskell has represented) on the change which had been made, in 1548, in that it was left free to each to confess or no. But it is an aid in interpreting the words, "or some other." I used it as a strong presumption as to the meaning of the Church of England, that since she had relaxed the strict rule which obliged her parishioners to confess to their Parish Priest, so that confessing to another instead of him was no longer an infraction of a positive duty to confess to him; the words, "or some other," might the rather be taken in their natural unrestrained sense.

Mr. Maskell objects to my saying¹, "The Parish Priest in England is not the 'proprius sacerdos' of the Council of Lateran. For the 'proprius sacerdos' was one who might require his parishioners to confess once in the year, previous to Communion, from which, if he abstained, he was, if he died, deprived of Christian burial ;” and he says, “Allow me to ask, Whence did you derive this strange definition of the ‘proprius sacerdos’?” I answer, “from Dominicus Soto, whom I had quoted in the preceding page:” “A person’s own Priest [proprius sacerdos] is one who can by his jurisdiction compel one under him [subditum ejus] to the Sacrament.” I added, “Since, then, the Church of England has left it free for us to confess or no, no one is, in her, subjected to another by this sort of jurisdiction.” Of course, it lies in the very words of Soto. One who is free to confess or no, cannot be subject to the Parish Priest by the same sort of jurisdiction as one who in the Priest can, by that jurisdiction, compel to confess. Soto says again⁶, “there is no jurisdiction where there is no power of compelling.” Suarez makes in some degree the same distinction of those who come under the ordinary jurisdiction of the Parish Priest, yet are exempt from his jurisdiction in the matter of confession. We shall see below, how Suarez rests the necessity of having leave from the Parish Priest, and not from the Bishop, to confess to another, on the ground that the parishioner was bound [i.e. by the Council of Lateran] to confess to the Priest, and not to the Bishop.

Mr. Maskell, however, says, “if any still thought it well for his soul's health to have recourse to the ministry of the priest, in order to receive absolution, he would continue in all respects to be subject to the same rules and restrictions as before."

He says it, but he does not prove it. He has no proof of this hypothetical or conditional jurisdiction, according to which a parishioner should not be obliged to confess his sins; but if he did confess them, should be obliged to confess them to his Parish Priest. The rules confining him to his Parish Priest are founded upon the Council of Lateran, and part of its discipline. The Council of Lateran, for the first time, required every one to confess to his own priest once in the year. And then, in order to prevent evasion, it forbade his confessing to an alien priest without asking and obtaining leave of his own. A wise precaution, so long as confession was compulsory, lest persons, in order to fulfil in some way the direction of the Church, but not truly penitent, should wish to use confession to a priest, but escape the watchfulness of the Pastor who might guard against their relapse. This appears from authorities of the time. I will here add a passage from the "Quatuor Sermones," to which Mr. Maskell alludes:—

"That ye be bound once a year to show your shrifts to your own curates, and if there be any of you that have more affection to another than to me, let me wite to whom and where, and he shall have right good leave, and Christ's blessing and mine. So that he do it in no deceit of his own soul, or to hide his sin from me, to the intent he might the longer abide therein, as some do and have done these many years. For I know more of their counsels than they wene that I do, or will I did."

But it remains for Mr. Maskell to prove that this rule was continued, when the ground upon which it rested, the compulsory confession, was removed. They are maxims in the Roman Church. "Whoso⁷ is not placed under any definite priest, and is in his own power, may confess to whom he will." "Any one in that which is in his own power, whenever, namely, he is bound to no others, may place himself under whom he will."

This same principle is admitted by Roman authorities, in the case of venial sins; nor do the exceptions raised by others to their mode of stating it, assert the principle itself. D. Soto holds persons to be free to confess venial sins to whom they will, because none are compelled to confess them. On this principle, then, since "there⁸ is no power of compelling" to confession in the English Church, there is no restriction to whom any one should confess.

Caietan, again, says, "No one is bound to confess venial sins, and so no one is, by the law, placed under any confessor for these; and therefore any one may be sacramentally absolved by any priest from venial sins."

By the same principle, then, in the English Church, since none is bound to confess sins, (the Church holding that sins may be forgiven upon confession to God only,) “no one is, by the law, placed under any confessor for these; and therefore any one may be sacramentally absolved by any priest.” In like way Ruard. Tapper says, “That⁹ jurisdiction, which is required for the absolution from venial sins, and from deadly sins once confessed, follows the power of the keys by the Ordinance of Christ, and so of Divine right, because, in these we are free, being subjected to the care and power of none;” as every one hath power, of Divine right, to absolve the Pope, if he choose him. Yet, as Suarez points out, all the principles of jurisdiction, except this, occur in this case. In the Roman Church, people are only exempt from confessing these sins to their own priest, because they are exempt from confessing them at all. If they confess them, they become subject to the other rules and principles of confession. Jurisdiction, it is contended, there is; only not this sort of jurisdiction. What the Church leaves free, she leaves wholly free. If they are at liberty to confess or no, they are at liberty to confess to whom they will. There is no definite law, permitting persons to confess these sins to whom they will. The Lateran Canon makes no exception. There is no rule exempting these from the ordinary "restrictions" of confessing to the Parish Priest. They are exempt on the single principle, that people being free not to confess them, are free, if they confess them, to confess them to what Priest they will.

Nor does that rule at all bear upon this, that a person in the Roman Church is free to confess his sins once only in the year, but if he confesses oftener, must still confess to his Parish Priest. For although he is not bound to confess oftener than once in the year, he is bound to confess all the deadly sins which he has committed in the year, in thought, word, or deed, to his Parish Priest. And the especial object of this is, that he may not deceive himself and the Parish Priest, by dividing his confession, so as to confess his sins, in part to one, in part to another, but that "the shepherd may know the face of his sheep." But if at those other times in the year he were to confess to another priest, since no law requires a sin to be confessed twice, those sins would be removed from the knowledge of the Parish Priest.

There is, then, no proof whatever of this sort of suspended jurisdiction, whereby a person should be altogether free to confess his sins to man or no, but should be bound, if he did confess them, to confess them to a particular priest.

And with this falls in that freedom, which is, even by some Roman writers, acknowledged to have existed, at least before Pope Urban II., A.D. 1067.

The English Church (as appears from her homilies) fell back upon the principles of the Primitive Church. The onus, then, would lie upon any one to show, that while falling back upon those principles in allowing confession to be used or no, she did not also adopt that other principle, so acknowledged in the West that it was received into the Decretals: "Who-so wishes to confess his sins, that he may find grace, let him seek a priest who knoweth how to bind and loose; lest if he be negligent about himself, he be neglected by Him Who mercifully admonisheth him, and desireth that both should not fall into the ditch, which he in his folly would not avoid."

The freedom to confess sin at all, to a priest or no, and the freedom to confess to what priest any one wills, occur here as correlatives.

But 2^{dly}, and that chiefly, I brought evidence that according to the rules in 1500, or at any time from the Council of Lateran, when confession was made compulsory, to the Reformation, the permission thus given, whether by the Church or the Parish Priest, to go to some other than himself, would have given to the parishioner full leave to go to any priest he willed, and to that priest full authority to receive him. The exact case I quoted happens to be given in the very words almost of the English Church, by Caietan and Reginald¹; but it does not rest upon their authority. It can make no difference in principle, whether one with cure of souls give leave to his parishioners, one by one, or collectively. It was admitted before the Reformation, that persons having cure of souls, who were incapable of giving absolution (as not having priest's orders, or in some other way disqualified²), might give leave to all their people. The principle is the same. It is, that leave given to a parishioner to confess to whom he willed, gave in itself, before the Council of Trent, full and complete authority to any priest whatsoever (not suspended nor directly prohibited) to receive the confession, and to give absolution. The principle is affirmed by the current of authority. I will repeat, for brevity, only that of Pope Adrian VI.³ "On the ground of such licence [to choose a confessor] he may choose any priest indifferently." When, then, Mr. Maskell says, "It was necessary that it should be a priest authorized to receive confessions, and approved for that purpose," he overlooks the authorities which I had adduced, and contradicts what is have the assistance of Caietan and of Reginaldus, and only theirs, in proof that such a permission, so given, is sufficient to enable any person belonging to that cure or parish to choose his own confessor." It is not, by any means, "only theirs." But before this disparaging sentence was past, it would have been better to have ascertained whether Caietan and Reginald were held to be right or wrong, or whether it was an allowed opinion.

said by them to have been "commonly held," before the Council of Trent, which is acknowledged⁴ to have made a change in this.

But then, as to the other clause: Is the priest, when he makes that exhortation, really giving a practical direction to his people; or is he, while seeming so to do, simply laying down an abstract proposition, that "people, in auricular confession, are not obliged to go always to their Parish Priest, but, with leave, may go to some other qualified priest, 'learned and discreet'?" I can hardly think that Mr. Maskell could have raised such a question, had he not renounced the English Prayer Book. If, instead of the Prayer Book, which is now to him a dead letter and a document only, he would conceive the same direction to be standing in the Missal, and so make the case real to himself, he could, I think, hardly look so unpractically on words, which, in that solemn office, the Church puts into the mouth of her priests.

The words occur in an exhortation to come to Holy Communion on the following Sunday or Holy-day. This exhortation sets forth what is to be done "in the mean season," in order to come "in the marriage garment required of God in Scripture." It gives practical directions what is mean time to be done. It sets forth repentance, purpose of amendment, reconciliation with neighbours, forgiveness of all, restitution. These things are to be done before the Communion; or, if any could not complete the restitution, he is to be "in full mind and purpose so to do, as soon as he is able." On these instructions, direct and practical, follows that so often mentioned: "And if there be any of you whose conscience is troubled and grieved in any thing, lacking comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned priest, taught in the law of God, and confess and open his sin and grief secretly, that he may receive such ghostly counsel, advice, and comfort, that his conscience may be relieved, and that of us (as of the ministers of God and of the Church) he may receive comfort and absolution, to the satisfaction of his mind, and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness." Such was the exhortation in 1548. Now I would be satisfied to ask any peasant, or any plain man who was a communicant (for this was written for plain men), "What has the priest been saying to you? Has he been telling you that, if your conscience is troubled, you may go to 'him or to some other?' or did he only tell you, that you are to ask him first, and if he gives you leave, you may then go to some other?"

There would be an end of all plain dealing, if these subtleties were introduced. What would be said of any one who, in any relation of life, or in any office, were to say, "You may come to me or some other," and only meant, "come to me, and if I give you leave, or you obtain leave elsewhere, you may then go to some other." What, if one who had the charge of prisoners said, "Come to me or to some other, and you shall have your chains loosed;" and he were afterwards to say, "I gave you no leave to go to any other. I only meant, that if you should first ask me, and I gave you leave, you might then go?" Would he not seem to have been mocking him? The "hypothetical" construction of plain words has been justly reprobated. What is this "hypothetical" leave, conveyed in terms as absolute as could be framed, and spoken to plain people?

Mr. Maskell doubts whether any one could have inferred from the exhortation any thing else than the one change of removing the necessity of confession ⁶. The exhortation presupposes that necessity to be already removed; it does not itself remove it. It is not a Canon, but an exhortation to persons under certain circumstances. It is addressed to persons, some of whom "thought it needful and convenient, for the quieting of their own consciences, particularly to open their sins to the priest; others were satisfied with a general confession. It bids both parties be satisfied with their own consciences, not judging other men's minds and consciences." This exhortation presupposes them to be free. So also do the directions prefixed to the Office for Holy Communion, for the exclusion of "open and notorious evil livers." It was to people thus entirely free as to the use of confession at all, that the Priest was directed by the Church to say, "let him come unto me, or to some other discreet and learned priest taught in the law of God." The very addition of the words, "discreet and learned, taught in the law of God," presupposes, as I said, that the choice was with him who wished to "open his griefs." To what end to admonish a person to go to a priest "discreet and learned, taught in the law of God," if it was not in his power to choose? The exhortation seems to have been suggested by the well-known words, then thought by all to be St. Augustine's, "Whoso willeth to confess his sins, that he may find grace, let him seek a priest who knoweth how to bind and loose." "He who confesseth at all, let him confess to the best priest that he can,"—language which has caused such insuperable difficulties to those who wished to make it square with the restrictions of the later Council of Lateran. Navarrus infers from those words, "In ⁷ the time of Augustine, it was not as yet forbidden to hear [in confession] the parishioners of others." He at least would see nothing strange, that the like words in the English Church should be so interpreted; the more so since he says, "that⁸ cannot be denied to be reasonable, which the whole Primitive Church observed," and that "a return to it ought to be easy."

Mr. Maskell says much about having appealed to the known acknowledged rules of the Church. He says⁹, "A letter was sent to you, referring to the known and acknowledged rules of the Catholic Church of England in the beginning of the sixteenth century," and "by making such a reference to previous and contemporary laws and practice." But the only rule to which Mr. Allies did appeal was one which did not exist, viz., that jurisdiction was only given directly, whether to a Parish Priest over his own flock, or to one specially appointed over the district or diocese. No word was said as to that whole class upon which I have dwelt at length, of jurisdiction derived indirectly. Mr. Maskell says now, "The words, 'or some other,' can only mean, 'come to me or to some other,' as you have been accustomed." It could not be strictly, "as they had been accustomed," for the monks had ceased; there were no privileges from the Pope; Bishops did not give them. But in this very sense, if a priest in 1500 had said, "come to me or to some other," those to whom he said it, might have gone to any one, approved by the Bishop or not approved, with cure of souls or without. It lies upon Mr. Maskell to show, why the words should not have the same meaning as before. Mr.

Maskell says¹, "Since the Council of Lateran, such had been the unvarying and well-known language of the Catholic Church:" "If you would obey this rule of the Church, namely, that you must confess once a year, come to me, your Parish Priest, set over you in the Lord; but if, for any just reason, or because of any privilege or licence, you desire to go elsewhere, to go to some other priest, I exhort you to do so."

Such was doubtless the meaning of the Church; and it was accounted a heavy sin if any priest did not allow his parishioners for just cause to go to some other priest. But if any priest had been directed by any authority to use the words which Mr. Maskell thus states, as being "the well-known language of the Catholic Church," he would by that very language have set his parishioners free to confess to whom they would. It is one thing that such should be the abstract principles of the Church,—quite another that the Church should put the words into the priest's mouth as a special and immediate direction to his parishioners. The restraining words which Mr. Maskell inserts "for any just reason, or because of any privilege or licence," never were used. In the sermon quoted above², the condition is expressed; "let me write to whom and where, and he shall have right good leave." If without it, before 1548, any priest had used, or been directed to use the words, "let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned priest, and confess and open his sin and grief secretly," he would thereby have given absolute authority to his parishioners to confess to any priest they would, and to that priest authority to receive his confession, and to absolve him.

It seems to me, then, an absolute paradox, invented for the occasion, to say that the words would not have the same force, when the Church directed the priest always to use them, so that they should not be the words of the priest only, but of the Church also.

Mr. Maskell says³, "There is one word in the Canon of the Lateran Council, which, naturally, you seem to shrink from; that is, he shall first ask and obtain leave."

³ Ab. p. 41. Mr. Maskell continues: "Having cited the Canon in p. 19, I do not think you allude to this word of the clause again, except in one place, where you say that it is an inconsistency to 'ask' for what we need not 'obtain.' It is incorrect to say that, as a rule, with regard to the annual confession, it was not needful to 'obtain' as well as to ask 'leave.'" Mr. M. does not cite the passage, which he says is incorrect. In p. 76, n. 12, and p. 159, I was speaking of the "ignorance of the priest" as a case in which the "law" of the Council of Lateran still left the parishioners absolutely free to leave the parish priest. I said that even those who restricted this law by the later Council of Lateran, which required all to ask and obtain leave of the parish priest, still inconsistently held, that he need only "ask," and need not "obtain," since the older law left them free. I pointed out the more consistent explanation of Suarez, that the Council of Lateran did not "revoke any licences given by the older law." But it did illustrate the subject, that even those who held that the older law was modified by the later, still, mostly, allowed that the freedom allowed by the older remained.

So far from shrinking from it, I said at the outset why it did not bear upon the subject. I said, that both this Canon and a constitution of Archbishop Reynolds⁴, laid down the duty of a parishioner, if he had not the leave of the Parish Priest; but what if he had leave? I then proceeded to show that, by the principles of the Church, our people had leave to go to another than the Parish Priest, and that those who had that leave were not, before the Council of Trent, restricted to one appointed or approved by the Bishop.

The rule in the English Church, that one Priest was not to absolve the Parishioner of another, is subsequent to the Canon of the Council of Lateran. The necessity of "asking and obtaining leave" was a part, and a part only of that Canon. It was dependent upon the former part of it, that "every one of either sex, who had attained to years of discretion, should confess to his own Priest once in the year." The direction that "if he wished to confess to a Priest not his own, he must first ask and obtain the leave of his own," was a relaxation of the former part of the same Canon. It was not a rule or enactment for itself; it was a mitigation of an enactment then for the first time made. Mr. Maskell would now turn this mitigation into a restriction. The rule of the Council of Lateran, which was a matter of discipline only, that "all should confess their sins once in the year to their own priest," was suspended, and the Church of England had returned to the greater freedom of the Church before that Council, and of the Primitive Church to which in her homilies she, so often, appealed. Navarrus says, "it⁵ is the common doctrine that any Presbyter of the Primitive Church could absolve any Christian." Mr. Maskell maintains apparently, (without any evidence, except what he thinks must have been the case), that the Church of England, while removing altogether the stringent rule of confessing once in the year to the Parish Priest, retained as a strict rule the relaxation of that rule in the latter part of the same Canon, that if the Parishioner had any just cause why he should not confess to that Priest, he should ask and obtain leave from him to go to another; i.e. if he had any good reason for not obeying the provision of that Canon as to the Parish Priest, he was, at least, to obtain the leave of the Parish Priest, to whom, by that Canon, he was bound to confess once in the year. By this clause, which softened the strictness of the new Canon, Mr. Maskell would bind the free leave which the Church of England requires her Priests to give, "let him come to me or to some other discreet and learned Priest." The old rule said, "you must ask and obtain leave;" the Priests of the Church of England are directed to give that leave ; they do give it solemnly, in the exhortation and appeal to people's consciences, directed by the Church, in the name of the Church whose ministers they are, whose words they speak and are bound to respect, from whose Altars they are speaking as her Ministers. Few probably would think it necessary that her people must, after this, ask for the leave which they had already received.

It is the part of a skilful controversialist to represent me as "making a few words effect a complete alteration of the ancient rules and practices in one, and a most important, particular of that discipline." I interpreted these words only as they were interpreted before me. I in no way especially interpreted them at all. All alike so understood them.

I brought in my letter grounds to prove, (and Mr. Maskell has brought no evidence to disprove it,) that, taking the words "me or some other" as they must have been understood in 1500, they must, if said by the Priest at the direction of the Church, have been understood to give free leave to a parishioner to confess to whom he would. But I said, further, the date of 1548 cannot be exclusively insisted upon, without implying that these words remained a dead letter from the Reformation until now. It must be argued, "In 1548 they must have had such restrictions, therefore they must have them now. We must take 1548 for our standard." But the practice since must be a commentary upon the words. If we were now, for the first time since the Reformation, making and receiving confessions, there might be reason to go back to what might have been the meaning of the words when they were first used. Had there been no evidence as to the meaning put upon them by the English Church since, we must have gone back to 1548, as one would, for any antiquated document, go back to contemporary authority. But a date 300 years ago cannot be assumed as an interpreter contrary to any subsequent recognized practice. Such practice might overrule even its obvious meaning, as I have shown with regard to the confession of priests ⁶ in the Western Church generally. The English rule, I believe, was the same in 1548 as in 1609; and no further defence of the English practice is, I believe, required, than what the rule before 1548 would furnish. But, in order to ascertain what the English rule is, the way in which it was practically understood from 1609 to 1679 (I name the time during which I know of Episcopal Visitation Articles,—bearing upon the words “me or some other”), is far clearer evidence than any presumption, whether the previous rules were continued or no.

Mr. Allies assumes, that ⁷, “for fifty years after Elizabeth’s accession, sacramental confession [i.e. the special confession to the Priest as distinct from the general and public confession] was very little practised in the Church of England.” He forgets the evidence which is furnished by the Canons of 1603. "Canons," I observed⁸, "are made with reference to existing practice." When, then, the 113th Canon permits "Parsons or Vicars, or, in their absence, their Curates, to present to their Ordinaries all such crimes as they have in charge, or otherwise, as by them, being the persons that should have the chief care for the suppressing of sin and impiety in their parishes, shall be thought to require due reformation," and yet, in so doing, expressly excepts the use of "confession of secret and hidden sins to the Minister," surely it is complete evidence that Christ's poor did, before 1603, use confession more or less.

Had there not been habitual confession in parishes, it would not have occurred to the framers of those Canons to have introduced the exception. The Canon allows to the Clergy to present to the Bishop (and to him only) crimes within their Parishes, with a view to their reformation. "Provided always," the Canon proceeds, "that if any man confess his secret and hidden sins to the Minister, for the unburdening of his conscience, and to receive spiritual consolation and ease of mind from him; we do not any way bind the said Minister by this our constitution, but do strictly charge and admonish him, that he do not at any time reveal and make known to any person whatsoever any crime or offence so committed to his trust and secrecy, (except they be such crimes as by the laws of this realm his own life may be called into question for concealing the same,) under pain of irregularity." The very exception which is made, (which exception, it is better to state, was "allowed also in the re-admission of the Jesuits into the University of Paris⁹,") and the severity of the punishment, show (if there were need) that the Canons had relation to an existing practice of receiving confessions. The punishment is the severest inflicted on the Clergy next to actual degradation. "Irregularity" is a prohibition to exercise any function of orders. This penalty is not mentioned as one annexed by the Canon Law to the "revealing of confessions;" at least if we may trust Ferraris¹. Such "revealing" was straightly forbidden by other Canons, and by the Council of Lateran²; it set a parishioner free (some held) from confessing to his own Priest. But this severe penalty was annexed, de novo, by the Canon of 1603. The Canon does not notice the Canon of Lateran, which had been superseded. It enacts a new and severe punishment. All the other Canons of 1603 relate to actual circumstances. On the assumption that there were no confessions, this must have been a provision unlike the rest. Even then, the Canons would have shown that confessions were in the mind of the Convocation of 1603, and that it contemplated their use. There would not have been this care to protect confessions, and, at the same time, to except the case which (by the law of the realm) affected the life of the Priest, unless the Canon had related to a very real existing system.

² The Canon of Lateran is, "Let him take good heed that neither by word nor sign nor any other way, he in any degree betray the sinner; but if he need more experienced advice, let him ask cautiously, without any hint as to the person: for we decree that he who shall presume to reveal a sin laid open to him in the penitential judicature, shall not only be deposed from the Priestly Office, but shall also be thrust into a strict monastery to perform perpetual penance."

And, in the nature of things, such is the only evidence which would remain as to the actual use of confession by the poor. History takes no notice of the penitence of private and undistinguished individuals. It does not chronicle "the short and simple annals of the poor." Posterity, save in some unwonted case, knows nothing either of their sins or their repentance. It is only when questions arise, as now, out of confession, that any public notice is taken of private confession. Private confession is an act of a nature to leave no memorial, save in Heaven. In our own days, before the more extended revival of confession, Parish Priests (as I know) still continued the injunction of the Church to move the sick to make special confession of their sins, if they "felt" their conscience troubled with any weighty matter; but they spoke not of it ordinarily, because all with which it was connected is so very sacred.

Mr. Maskell would put me upon the proof that the words "me or some other," have always been taken in that unrestrained sense. A reader's mind may thus be drawn off from the opposite question; "Is there any evidence that they have ever been understood otherwise by any one before Mr. Allies?" And yet, if the choice had not been left free to individuals, if 'others' than the Parish Priest had not been authorized by the words "me or some other" to receive those who came to them, there must have been evidence to the contrary. Mr. Maskell still says (although he does not prove it) that the "some other" must have been some one "authorized to receive confessions, and approved for that purpose." According to the evidence which I adduced, the permission given by the Parish Priest, in such words as the English Church directs her priests to use, in itself authorized any other priest to receive the confession, without being otherwise authorized or approved for that purpose. The only further evidence which the case admits of in the subsequent history of the English Church, is that Bishops, Priests, and people acted on that understanding. Legislation is in order to regulate; it does not exist about what is free. But Bishops have formally given directions insisting upon the words "me or some other," when the words "some other" would be no one at all, unless they meant "any other." It could not mean one authorized or approved by the Bishops themselves, since they approved none, and knew that they had approved none. For, to anticipate an objection, it is quite certain that when one, before the Reformation, received leave from the Parish Priest to confess to some other than himself, he had no occasion to apply to the Bishop. It cannot then be said, that the "some other" might be one, whom the Bishop would approve if he were asked. It was never any part of the discipline of the Church, that a parishioner should apply to the Bishop, except in the case, after the Council of Lateran, when one, obliged to confess once in the year to the Parish Priest, left him either for his ignorance or immorality, without having obtained leave from himself. It was said by some authorities, that since both the Bishop and the Priest had charge of the soul of the Parishioner, the sin of the Priest did not vitiate the authority of the superior, the Bishop. But this opinion related only to this single case. In other cases, no application to the Bishop needed to be made; nor in this, if the Bishop resided at a distance, or was difficult of access. It sufficed that he did not forbid it. "Although," Suarez says³, "the inferior pastor does not need the positive consent of the superior to give this permission, yet it is necessary that he do not contradict it by recalling or hindering that permission." And again; "All⁴ authors agree, that the leave of the parish priest, or of the proximate 'own priest,' is sufficient by itself, without the leave of the other remote superior; because this seems to be plainly inferred from the Lateran Council [in that it says, ‘except with the counsel of his own Priest’]; and because the faithful or parishioners are bound to confess to the Parish Priest, not to the Bishop or Pontiff, and therefore it sufficeth if they confess by his leave alone.” “This doctrine is true,” Suarez adds, “but now is to be limited according to the decree of the Council of Trent, Sess. 23, c. 15.” [The rule which directs that no one should be considered qualified to hear confessions who is not approved by the Bishop.]

Mr. Maskell passes over the Visitation Articles, upon which he once dwelt⁵, “because⁶ a little consideration would show any of your readers that those inquiries might equally well, and as easily, apply, whether all persons had or had not, at that period, unlimited power to choose their own confessors.”

I will set down the words of Bishop Andrewes, and would then ask any one, what is their plain meaning? “Whether doth your minister, before the several times of the administration of the Lord’s Supper, admonish and exhort his parishioners, if they have their consciences troubled and disquieted, to resort unto him or some other learned minister, and open his grief, that he may receive such ghostly counsel and comfort as his conscience may be relieved, and by the minister he may receive the benefit of absolution, to the quieting of his conscience and avoiding of scruple. And if any man confesse his secret and hidden sinnes, being sicke or whole, to the minister, for the unburthening of his conscience and receiving such spiritual consolation, doth or hath the said minister at any time revealed and made known to any person whatsoever any crime or offence so committed to his trust and secrecy, contrary to the 113th Canon?"

I alleged these articles, directly, in answer to the only point then alleged, that the "some other" must be "some one appointed by the Bishop for that diocese or district." My argument was, the Bishops appointed and approved none for this end. Yet they themselves inquire whether each minister in their diocese "exhorted his parishioners to resort unto him or some other learned minister, and open his grief." The "some other," then, could not be "some other" appointed or even approved by them. For they appointed or approved of none. There is, then, absolutely, no room for any other restriction. And with this agree the notices of confession in the popular religious books which I cited⁷, Dean Comber, Bishops Cosin, Sparrow, Taylor, Duppa.

To take another writer, nearer to the times of the Reformation, is it conceivable that Bishop Jewell could have written as he did, if the Church of England had bound down all her children to confess to their own Parish Priests, unless, besides the direction in the public service, he gave them express personal leave to go to some other? The whole question which he and others are maintaining against Roman Catholic controversialists, is that the Church of England allowed of confession. Bishop Jewell says, "Touching^s the third [private confession], if it be discreetly used, to the greater comfort and better satisfaction of the penitent, without superstition or other ill, it is not in any wise by us reprov'd. The abuses and errors set apart, we do no more mislike a 'private confession' than a 'private sermon.' Thus much only we say, that 'private confession,' to be made unto the minister, is neither commanded by Christ, nor necessary to salvation." And again: "As for private confession, abuses and errors set apart, we condemn it not, but leave it at liberty."

Or to go nearer still, Bishop Latimer says, "But⁹ to speak of right and true confession, I would to God it were kept in England, for it is a good thing. And those which finde themselves grieved in conscience might goe to a lerned man, and there fetch of him comfort of the Word of God, and so come to a quiet conscience, which is better and more to be regarded then all the riches of the world. And surely it grieveth me much that such confessions are not kept in England."

^s Defence of the Apology of the Church of England, c. 6, Div. i. ii.

⁹ Sermon on the 3rd Sunday after Epiph. fin.

The words "a lerned man" correspond with the words of the Exhortation "some other discreet and learned Minister." Both equally imply the freedom of choice.

Bishop Ridley, in like manner, insists on that quality of a minister, "that he should be able to instruct," which corresponds with the same phrase and with the older "Sacerdotem scientem ligare et solvere." His words are in a private and confidential letter, wherein he appeals to his long and uniform opinion:—"You¹ have known me long indeed; in the which time it has chanced me, as you say, to mislike some things. It is true, I grant; for sudden changes, without substantial and necessary cause, and the heady setting forth of extremities, I did never love. Confession unto the minister which is able to instruct, correct, and inform the weak, wounded, and ignorant conscience, indeed I ever thought might do much good to Christ's congregation, and so I assure you, I think even at this day."

Or to take Archbishop Ussher, as one of the Calvinistic school. In proof of our retaining Confession, he cites our public form, as the injunction of the Church and the act of the Minister:—"We² tell him againe, that by the publike order prescribed in our Church, before the administration of the Holy Communion, the minister likewise doth exhort the people, that if there bee any of them, which cannot quiet his own conscience, but requireth further comfort or counsell; he should come to him, or some other discreet and learned minister of God's word, and open his griefe:"—and infers, "Be it therefore knowne unto him, that no kinde of Confession, either publicke or private, is disallowed by us, that is in any way requisite for the due execution of that ancient power of the Keyes which Christ bestowed upon His Church." The one point to which he objects is the absolute necessity of confession to salvation. But afterwards, quoting the same passage of Origen which I myself quoted ³, he insists on the freedom of choice of which, as a Bishop, he was cognizant.

"It was no part of his [S. Gregory Nyssen's] meaning to advise us, that we should open ourselves in this manner unto everie hedge-priest; as if there were a vertue ⁴ generally annexed to the order, that upon confession made, and absolution received from any of that ranke, all should be straight made up; but he would have us communicate our case both to such Christian brethren, and to such a ghostly father as had skill in physick of this kinde, and out of a fellow-feeling of our grieve, would apply themselves to our recoverie."

⁴ The context shows that what Archbishop Ussher here excepted against, is the thought that confession and absolution would do all, without any care as to the right state of soul in the person confessing. He himself says of the Jesuit, "He hath here done us open wrong in charging us to denie that Priests have power to forgive sins, whereas the verie formall words, which our Church requireth to be used in the ordination of a minister, are these: 'Whose sinnes thou doest forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sinnes thou doest retaine, they are retained.' " . . . "For all acknowledge most willingly, that the principall part of the Priest's ministerie is exercised in the matter of forgiveness of sinnes."

Dr. Crakanthorp, again, once an esteemed controversialist, in the beginning of the 17th century, to his Roman Catholic opponent: "As to auricular confession being abrogated among us, thou dealest artfully and deceitfully. Private confession, whereby any disburdens into the bosom, or, if thou willest, the ear of the Priest, the anguish of his mind for one or more sins committed; the absolution, moreover, of such sinner, after an earnest and unfeigned repentance done by him, through the keys of the Church committed to all presbyters, our Church both teaches and approves." "We have not abolished private confession, nor private absolution ⁵."

Or to take an early work of Archbishop Wake, who lived on to 1732, he uses the same unlimited language as to the permission of Confession as Archbishop Ussher, and nearly the same words:—"The ⁶ Church of England refuses no sort of confession either public or private, which may be any way necessary to the quieting of men's consciences,

or to the exercising of that power of binding and loosing which our Saviour Christ has left to His Church. 7

“We have our penitential Canons for public offenders. We exhort men, if they have any the least doubt or scruple, nay, sometimes though they have none, but especially before they receive the Holy Sacrament, to confess their sins. We propose to them the benefit not only of ghostly advice, how to manage their repentance, but the great comfort of Absolution too, as soon as they shall have completed it.

“When we visit our sick, we never fail to exhort them to make a special confession of their sins to him that ministers to them, and when they have done it, the Absolution is so full, that the Church of Rome itself could not desire to add any thing to it.

“For the rest, we think it an unnecessary rack to men’s consciences, to oblige them, where there is no scruple, to reveal unto their Confessor every the most secret fault, even of wish or desire, which the Church of Rome exacts: nor dare we pronounce this discipline sacramental, and necessary to salvation; so that a contrite sinner who has made his Confession to God Almighty shall not receive a pardon unless he repeat it to the priest too. This, we beg leave with assurance to say, is directly contrary to the tradition of the Church, and to many plain and undoubted places of Holy Scripture. And if this be all our Reformation be guilty of, that we advise not that which may torment and distract, but is no way apt to settle men's consciences ; nor require that as indispensably necessary to salvation which we find no where commanded by God as such, we assure Mr. de Meaux we see no cause at all either to regret the loss, or to be ashamed of the change."

Archbishop Wake speaks chiefly of "the comfort of Absolution," but only because God therein forgiveth sins:—"We⁷ exercise the power of the Keys to the forgiveness of their sins, because the benefit of this is the same now that ever it was; Christ's promise remains, and whilst we piously make use of the same means, we doubt not but it shall be to the like effect."

These⁸ and others had no doubt that we in the Church of England are wholly free, and are witnesses what was the belief of the Church in their day. I noticed, moreover, that "there is not a vestige of any other interpretation of the words during three centuries." Surely, too (as I said), "the concurrent interpretation which so many have separately put upon these words, is some indication what the Church means by them." People, one by one, have found in these words the meaning which, Mr. Maskell says, I put upon them. They of themselves have acted upon them. Surely, in a plain, simple direction intended for them, the way in which it has been understood, is some evidence how it is naturally to be understood.

People in these and other days, with the Prayer Book in their hands, so read the words, and so acted. All this is quite natural, if, as I said, the words in their plainest meaning conveyed, as they did, to plain people, permission to go to whom they thought best before God. There can be no rules about what is fully free. The very absence of rules on this subject in the Canons, while there are rules as to other matters of jurisdiction, shows the more that it was free. There will obviously be numberless occasions at all times,—some good, some bad,—why persons should not wish to confess to their Parish Priest. The frequent re-enactment of the same rule shows, not only the mind of the Church, but the tendency of the people to break it. The books of Canonists and Divines, from the Council of Lateran to the Reformation, and since, in the Roman Church, uniformly treat of this subject. Mr. Maskell speaks (as I did also) of frequent Canons, enforcing confession to the Parish Priest. It was, then, difficult to obey that rule. How is it, then, that, since the Reformation, there is not a single rule on the subject? There was, as I have shown, confession. It could not all at once, amid the increased liberty after the Reformation, have been so entirely easy for every one to go exclusively to his own Parish Priest.

Many of the Parish Priests were not well instructed at first. Mr. Maskell will hardly be disposed to maintain that rules before the Reformation, which were not done away, were so stringently adhered to, that there could be no need of any fresh enforcement. The Provincial Constitutions would, before the Reformation, have been abolished by Henry VIII., unless his death had prevented it. A new draft of ecclesiastical law was again prepared under Edward VI., and again prevented by his death. The estimation of the old laws must have been much shaken by these and other events. How is it, then, that neither in the Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, under Edward VI. (which never came into force), nor in the Canons of 1604, is there any enactment on the subject, unless it was intended to leave the parishioners free? There were Canons (as I pointed out) "to prevent contempt of the Parish Priest, or irregular exercise of his office" in other respects. The old law against receiving to Communion the parishioner of another, to the contempt of his Parish Priest, was re-enacted. How is it, then, that there was no regulation as to confessions, (which yet are noticed in the 113th Canon,) if it was intended that the choice should be restricted? How is it that no biography, no rule, no record, mentions that any Bishops appointed or approved Priests for hearing confessions, if it had been necessary (which it was not before the Council of Trent) that those who received confessions should have that approbation? Old registers, since the Reformation, mention from time to time that dispensations were given by the Parish Priest to eat flesh-meat on fasting-days. The permission to use flesh-meat is not surely of so much moment as the permission to choose a confessor. The practice of giving faculties (had it existed) is one which would have involved records. Biographers give minute accounts of the lives of persons, whom (if any) Bishops would at each time have appointed to the office. There is no lack of facts, nor of the knowledge of appointments in the Church. How is it, then, that there is not one trace of this, which Mr. Maskell assumes to be the system by which confessions must have been regulated since the Reformation? There were confessions; there is no trace of any such regulations. The words "me or some other," were living words. They were spoken and acted upon, as now. Either those who used confession in England, must, amid all the liberty granted at the Reformation, have become all at once more forbearing as to their choice, than Western Christians had been since the Council of Lateran, and all been uniformly content with their Parish Priest for this difficult office, so that none, however he seemed invited by the Church herself in the words, "let him come to me or to some other discreet and learned Minister of God's word," left his Parish Priest; or the Bishops of the Church of England, knowing that they did act on the choice given them, thought those restrictions inapplicable, and by tacit consent left them free.

Mr. Allies explains this silence as to any former rules, but it is by conceding the whole point as to the practice of the English Church from the beginning of the 17th century: "When⁹, in the times of James and Charles, our Divines had risen to higher notions of the Church and its functions, they supposed this power of inward spiritual jurisdiction to reside in Bishops and Priests." This opinion (if they held it) is one which has been held in the Roman Church also. Those who held it in the Roman Church, held that "any¹ priest might, by virtue of those sacramental words [whose sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them] absolve any sinners, sufficiently disposed and confessing." According to them, then, there needed no other jurisdiction. If this statement of Mr. Allies means (as it seems) to attribute to the English Bishops at the beginning of the 17th century any opinion not universally received, it must mean that "the inward spiritual jurisdiction" so wholly "resided in Bishops and Priests," that there needed not any external assignment of it. For if this meant only, that jurisdiction was given virtually in ordination, but that the exercise of it depended upon the subsequent assignment, by the Church, of individuals towards whom it should be exercised, this would be simply (when it comes to be explained) the ordinary meaning of jurisdiction in this respect. But then (as far as relates to the Bishops) there would be no question as to the meaning of the phrase "me or some other;" because it would be maintained that they held that jurisdiction so resided in the Priest that no further authority was needed.

But this being so, that other permission of "tacit licence" also finds place here. Mr. Maskell admits this². If confession, as follows from the Canon of ² I was speaking of "custom" or "tacit licence" as applied to our Church; I was not speaking of the present day chiefly. Those, in this day, are but acting upon the custom, which is expressed in books, and which has been the only custom, since the Reformation. A custom continues until it is contradicted. Mr. Maskell's objection has again been occasioned by his overlooking the past, in which that custom was established.

³ "Possibly they do bear upon the fact of the entire cessation in those days of any formal appointment by Bishops of special confessors for their own dioceses and districts, and in this sense we may find in them an example of 'tacit licence.'"—p. 43. And yet he had said, p. 33, as confidently as before, "It was necessary that he [the self-chosen confessor] should be a person authorized to receive confessions, and approved by the Bishop;" and here he adds, "but they [the Visitation Articles] have not a single word which can show that the English Bishops so interpreted the words, 'Let him come to me, or to some other,' as to permit every person, in every parish, to choose, without restriction on the choice, their own confessor." The Bishops, when they enjoined the use of the Church's words, "Let him come to me or to some other," surely did direct the Priest to use words which implied a choice; and since these words conveyed a choice, there was absolutely no restriction. The only restriction, according to Mr. Maskell, is to one appointed or sanctioned by themselves; even had there been such a restriction before 1548, there could be none then, since the Bishops appointed none. The words, "or some other," could only mean "any other," or "no other." If the choice was wholly free, they meant "every other." If it

1603, was a real practice in the Church of England after the Reformation, and was recommended in the case that persons "could not quiet their consciences," by the Bishops in their Visitation Articles; and the Bishops, themselves neither appointing, approving, nor authorizing any other, repeated and enforced and required the Parish Priests to use the words, "let him come to me or to some other," it was far more than "tacit consent" which they gave to the people to go to whatever priest they willed. They did not merely look on; they themselves required the Priests publicly to read an exhortation, which could, by plain people, be construed in no other sense, and which has been so construed.

It is difficult to re-state evidence on any point, without, rather, diminishing its force. For to re-state it fully, would be to repeat what had been said before. And this is an evil incidental to all controversy which involves rejoinder, that the reply, almost of necessity, is less vivid and less full. It makes less impression than the original statement; and the attention is worn out by a wearisome statement and removal of insulated and desultory objections. I must then refer back to my original statement, as containing, I believe, a considerable body of evidence; and would here only try, if possible, to make my meaning clear.

had been restricted, as Mr. M. contends, it would have been some non-existing person: i. e. the clause in so solemn a service would have been a mockery.

Mr. Maskell, as I understand him, accepts my statement that all which is meant by "jurisdiction," is that a person may lawfully apply to a given priest, to confess his sins, and from him, if penitent, to receive absolution.

On the other hand, I stated unhesitatingly, that one bound to confess to the Parish Priest cannot leave him, and go to another, to receive the benefit of absolution; because, going unlawfully, he goes sinfully, and can receive no benefit; displeasing God, while he seeks His sentence of absolution through the Priest.

But "jurisdiction" does not come, simply and directly, from the Bishop by any separate and further act to the individual Priest who gives special absolution upon special confession of sins. It is not transfused to the individual, like a spiritual gift or power; for it may come, as has been said, from one himself excommunicate, or who cannot act by virtue of it himself. There is no way of accounting for the varied cases in which Priests are allowed to give special absolution upon confession, except that Priests have jurisdiction in any case, in which another may lawfully apply to them.

Thus, the technical questions and language about jurisdiction, which, as being technical, may perplex ordinary readers, may be, for this purpose, dispensed with, as being resolved into this simple statement.

The only question, then, is, to whom, upon the principles of the English Church, persons may lawfully apply, that they may "open their griefs," or “make special confession of their sins.” About Priests themselves, there is no question. By the common custom of the Church, up to the Council of Trent, they could choose whom they would, to whom to confess their sins. The Church of England has not, like the Council of Trent, restricted them.

Nor is there any question about any one “in probable, although uncertain, peril of death.” The Church of England has made no restriction on the liberty allowed at all times by the whole Church.

Nor is there any question about any one to whom the law of the Church, or his own Parish Priest, gives leave, directly or virtually.

Nor is there any question now, that a person, free not to confess to his Parish Priest, need not go to one “appointed by the Bishop for that Diocese or district.” I suppose that it will also be allowed that scholars or members of the University, not being under any Parish Priest, are, by the ancient law, free.

The questions, then, still raised by Mr. Maskell, are two :—

1. Whether the words, “If there be any of you whose conscience is troubled and grieved in any thing, lacking comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned Priest, taught in the law of God, and confess and open his sin and grief secretly,” &c., do give the people any leave at all, or whether they are not rather an enunciation of an abstract truth, that the Church allows persons, who have personally leave of the Parish Priest to go to any other, to do what he allows them. To give Mr. Maskell's words, p. 24 :—" I still think, that this clause—' Let him come to me or to some other learned and discreet minister of God's word,' was no more than a re-declaration or re-publication of the old rules of the Church of England, that people, in auricular confession, are not obliged to go always to their Parish Priest, but, with leave, may go to some other qualified Priest, 'learned and discreet;' and that the clause meant, and could justly mean, no more than that." In other words, the Church of England, after the Reformation in 1548, thought it necessary to declare that she was not more stringent in her rules as to the Priests to whom her children should confess, than she was before. She seemed to be exhorting people with troubled consciences, as to what they were to do in the next week; but she was only then making a "re-publication of the old rules." Her exhortation to people about their souls was an abstract enactment only. She told them they were to get relief, but she did not mean them to act upon the obvious meaning of her words. She said to those with unquiet consciences, " Let him come to me or to some other discreet and learned Priest taught in the law of God's word;" but she meant only, " come to me, and then, if I think that you have any fit cause, and give you leave, you may go to some other, but not without a further and express leave to each of you individually."

How Mr. Maskell can ever have read that exhortation, and not have understood that when he said, "Let him come to me or some other," he thereby gave leave to his parishioners to go "to some other," I cannot understand. I should have thought that no one could have imagined that the English words "come to me or to some other" could mean any thing else than to give a choice between the person speaking and that other.

Mr. Maskell, on the contrary, looking upon this exhortation as an abstract regulation, or "re-declaration, or re-publication of the old rules," thinks that if the words had stood "let him come unto me," this would "have taken away all the liberty which repeated canons and institutions had given men for ages, of going, lawfully and for just reasons, to some other qualified Confessor than their Parish Priest." As if a father, calling a child, and bidding him come to him, hindered the father from having the power of sending it to another, if he thought best. A Canon, which should enact, "If any man shall have his conscience troubled in any thing and lack comfort or counsel, he shall go to his Parish Priest, and to none other," would be decisive, if no exception should be added. But how an exhortation to the people (if it had so stood), "If there be any of you whose conscience is troubled, let him come to me," can by any one be thought to preclude the Priest from letting him, when he comes, go, for just cause, to some other,

I understand not ⁴. Such paradoxes are their own answer.

Mr. Maskell says much about my supposing so much to lie under those words, "me or some other." Certainly, he puts no less, if he thinks that, had they been omitted, the Parish Priest, being directed by the Church to invite those whose consciences were burdened, to come to him, would cut off every rule of the Church, which allowed him to depute the care to another, or to permit his Parishioner to choose some other, or the Bishop to appoint one. A mere positive invitation to come to him, could, of course, not deprive him of any other powers when the person did come, or the Bishop, who is not named, of his.

I need hardly dwell on that other technicality, that if the words be taken as the Priest's, they must be orally pronounced by him. As I said, they are not his only, but the Church's by him. And when the Priest is bound to say those words, and the Prayer Book, in which they are contained, is put into the people's hands, as a direction and authority for them, it is idle to say that an oral pronounciation of the words is necessary.

I may add, that unless the Church of England had, in this way, enlarged the choice of her children, she would have left it exceedingly narrowed, within what was allowed before the Reformation. I have quoted already from Navarrus, the extent of the privileges given by the Pope to individuals, even to peasants, to choose their own Confessor; an extent of liberty so great that Navarrus thought it no change of principle that it should be extended to the whole of Christendom⁵. Besides these, there were the very numerous Priests of Monastic orders, to whom the Pope had given privileges of hearing confessions, so that one who made confession to one of them, would have been dispensed from the duty of confessing within the year to his Parish Priest⁶. People then had large choice already. It is no unusual thing to hear, among Roman Catholics, of persons "choosing their Confessors." But the Monks had been dispersed through the rapacity of Henry VIII., before the Reformation began. Mr. Maskell then would have us to suppose that the Church of England, which has neither of these facilities, left her children under more stringent regulations, than they were before ; and that, having freed them from the necessity of confessing, she left those, who could not quiet their consciences, more completely at the discretion of their Parish Priest, than they ever were before. And this, because he does not take the words, "let him come to me or to some other discreet and learned Priest," in their plain grammatical sense, and will not infer that the word "or" leaves a choice between the persons spoken of.

2. The other point to which Mr. Maskell (p. 33) still seems to hold, is that, even if the leave be given, it would still be "necessary that he [the priest chosen] should be a priest authorized to receive confessions, and approved for that purpose."

He has not noticed the authorities which I quoted at length, and one or two of which I have now again adduced, to show that this was not necessary before the Council of Trent. They declare that it was "the common opinion of Theologians" that such approbation was not needed. And since this censure is now still more pointedly directed against myself, I must repeat, that those about whom the question was raised by some Canonists, were Monks ; that the ground of their supposed disqualification was not want of authority, but liability to ignorance ; and that the writer who most strongly requires the approbation of a Bishop, distinctly separates⁷ the question from that of jurisdiction, and allows that Graduates in Theology may be chosen without such licence.

As Mr. Maskell has not even noticed these authorities, it is needless to do more than refer to them. They are not selected authorities; and they speak, some of them, not in their own name only, but in that of Divines in general. "It is commonly held," says Stephanus Auffreri^{us}. "It is to be held with the Theologians," says Medina. "Theologians commonly hold," says Gregory de Valentia. "By virtue of the faculty of choosing a qualified confessor, they go indifferently to any priest," says Pope Adrian VI. "Such is the common opinion of the moderns," says even Melchior Canus. "Some few (nonnulli) Jurists hold the contrary," says again Medina. "There need be no fear," says Dominicus Soto⁸, "but that they [those free to choose a confessor] may choose whom they will. And this is the common opinion." As I did not before cite Soto, who was a celebrated Divine at the Council of Trent, I will set down his grounds at length. He puts the question thus:—

"There is a doubt as to those, who, having a faculty of choosing a confessor, either through a diploma from the Pope, or from the Bishop, or from the Parish Priest, have full liberty of choosing what priest they will, whether they are bound to choose ordinary curates, or those religious only, who are set forth through the Bishop. There are not wanting those who think that such as have such privileges, not freely choose a faculty, but are confined to choose those who are in some other way confessors."

He adduces their grounds, and answers as above, "Yet, these things notwithstanding, it is not to be feared but that they have power to choose, &c.

"The reason is, that to absolution is required only the power of order and jurisdiction; and the power of order every priest hath; and he who gave the privilege conferreth jurisdiction through the election of the penitent⁹. But because the question hangs on this second, it is proved first from the words of the bull that they can choose a Confessor. For this is not to choose him who is a Confessor, but through the choice to make him a Confessor; i. e. to choose him to [the office of] a Confessor; as, when a Bishop is chosen, he is not chosen who was a Bishop, but he who was not, is chosen to [the office of] a Bishop. And although there be added 'qualified,' that addition meaneth two things: first, that he be not suspended by censure, or excommunicated by name, &c.; secondly, the penitent is admonished according to the tenour of the Canon, de Pœnit. Dist. 1, c. 88, 'to choose a Confessor who knows how to loose and to bind,' yet still the choice is left to himself; for privileges are not to be narrowed more. Theology words go: and doubtless, if the intention of the Pontiff were, that none but ordinary Confessors should be chosen, he would not have passed it over in silence; since, then, he did not express it, that restriction is gratuitously assumed. For as to the power of the Pope, that he could do this, none may doubt.

“And in the chapter quoted (Decr. Greg. v. 38. 16), where Gregory granted to Prelates the power of choosing a Confessor, he makes no restriction, but says, that without the consent of his superior, he may choose to himself a prudent Confessor; in like way, then, is understood the grant of the diploma [bull]. But to the argument that the Pope is not supposed to choose unlearned and unqualified men, it is not permitted to murmur against the intention of the Pope and Prelates. However, if we look round those who have the cure of parishes, and possess sacerdotal cures, perchance (this is not to be said without grief) we may find as many unlearned and unqualified priests having the cure of souls, as without that cure; so that it may often be much more advisable to choose out of the latter [those without cure of souls] than out of the former. In short, this is plainly established, if a village priest should give his parishioner leave to confess to another, albeit he should add nothing else, who should doubt that he may choose any priest whom he may prefer, whether Parish Priest or other? Wherefore, then, may he not freely choose, who has the Pope's licence? Lastly, the commissaries of indulgences seem now to have settled this dispute, so that this discussion of the schools is ended by authority of the Pontiff. For in the very recent Jubilee of St. James, the grant came under this form, that 'any one might choose as Confessor a priest secular or religious, who was not suspended, nor specially rejected by his Prelate,' 'suspended or rejected through any censure,' as though it said, any one else may be chosen without any exception."

Until Mr. Maskell has answered, not me, but these acknowledged authorities in the Roman Church, of the full and explicit statement of Suarez, it is needless for me to say any thing further against an opinion irrelevant (in that the rule relates to the Monks, and is, on that very ground, said by a rigid Roman authority, not to apply to secular priests generally ¹) and unsupported. Of course, counter-authorities might be adduced of two sorts; 1) Roman Catholic writers speaking of the practice subsequent to the Council of Trent, which decreed (Suarez says) as something new that the approbation of the Bishop should be required for those not having cure of souls; 2) the very authorities whom the above writers set aside as insufficient. But what would be to be shown is, that these writers are not writers of authority, or that our practice is not sufficiently justified by what they aver to have been "commonly held by Theologians" before the Council of Trent. It would further be to be shown, that Bishops ever have approved or appointed persons to hear confessions since the Reformation; and since they have not, and yet themselves encouraged confessions, that they did not establish a custom which we may lawfully follow, until or unless they authoritatively rescind it.

Mr. Maskell, however, thinks it right to interfere between the English Bishops, in whose dioceses I have received confessions, and myself; and he animadverts upon the summary account which I gave of my practice, as if it had not been sufficiently explicit. All this is beside the question as to jurisdiction. Whether or no I have exercised a right discretion upon this or that point, might affect my own personal qualifications, but it has no reference whatever to the authority under which I have acted. A priest, who was "a revealer of confessions," or had any of the other disqualifications mentioned by writers on this subject, might be a sinful, or, in some cases, a pestilential confessor, but the abso-lutions which he gives in the name of Christ are valid.

The implied statements are,—1st. That the Bishops do not know of my receiving confessions. 2nd. That I have received confessions beyond what I had stated, in that I went from home into other dioceses for the express purpose of receiving them: that I urged the use of confession: that I have received them not to quiet the conscience before receiving communion. 3rd. That I have secretly received them against the known will of parents, and, to say the least, encouraged the concealment, and when it “weighed down” their “minds,” “urged specious arguments, which failed to remove their burning sense of shame and of deceitfulness.”

1. I certainly do not see what office Mr. Maskell has, having forsaken our Communion, to ask me whether I have or have not the sanction of the Bishops in whose dioceses I have received, or do receive, Confessions. They who do use confession with myself may ask me this, and them I would gladly satisfy. I stated, before, the grounds upon which I did not, in the first instance, apply to any Bishop. It was, that neither those who came to me, nor those other Clergymen of my own standing with whom I advised, and whose counsel I took, had any doubt whatsoever that there was a clear direction of the Church, and so, that a Bishop could only refer us to that rule². The confessions which I at first received were in the University, which is not under the Bishop of the Diocese wherein it is situate, as neither is, by custom immemorial, the Cathedral Church in Oxford. I had no occasion then, or ground, to refer to the late Bishop of Oxford.

Mr. Maskell informs me of a case in which, "very lately, in a somewhat public and judicial way, the Bishop of Exeter has condemned, even by curates licensed in his own diocese, the practice of receiving persons in auricular confession, except in order to quiet their consciences before admission to Communion." This is a distinct question. In the case, which is, I suppose, chiefly, if not alone, alluded to, the Bishop dismissed the complaint against that Clergyman, not being the Parish Priest, for admitting certain persons to special confession in order to quiet their consciences before the Holy Communion, expressly on the ground, that the words of the Church in the Exhortation to Communion, gave liberty to the party confessing, to choose "any discreet and learned Minister of God's Word," to whom to make confession.

The Bishop of Exeter then, distinctly, "in a somewhat judicial way," laid down that the Church, by directing her Priests to use the words in the Exhortation, "Let him come to me or to some other discreet and learned Minister of God's word," gave permission to the parties confessing to choose "what Priest they would." This, then, being the law of the Church, a Priest required, in the Bishop's mind, no further authority, or sanction, or approbation from himself, as neither did he, according to the law of the Church, before the Council of Trent.

I, of course, fully acknowledge the right of a Bishop (if he think it necessary) to prohibit an individual from receiving confessions in his Diocese, as he also might from preaching. Nor could I either preach or hear confessions against the authority of the Bishop. When locally suspended here by those who had the power so to do, I either declined to preach elsewhere, or applied for the leave of the Bishop of the Diocese. Until any circumstances of doubt occurred, I felt entitled by the law of the Church, equally to preach or to receive those who "came to me" to "open their griefs for the benefit of absolution." And since Mr. Maskell especially enquires whether I "ever ventured to ask the Bishop of London," I will say that I did not, in the first instance, think of asking, on the precise ground which I have named already, that none who received confessions had any doubt whatsoever that the Church gave that authority. No doubt existed upon it. None questioned it. I heard also incidentally (although not from the Bishop himself) what left me no doubt both that the Bishop of London knew what I did; and I knew that a practice, precisely identical with my own, had been fully explained to him.

(2, a.) I had stated, "In like way when residing elsewhere, I could not but conceive myself included in the Church's words, 'or some other,' and so, when any came to me, I ministered to them." Mr. Maskell notes, "from which, of course, no one would suppose that you go from home into other dioceses for the express purpose of receiving auricular confessions."

I was not speaking, in that page, of continued confessions; of them I spoke in the page following. In that place, I was speaking of the way in which my hearing of confessions gradually increased. God, in His Providence, led me to different places, and people came to me when "residing" there. In the following page I said, "I mention this now, because it has occasioned me to continue to receive confessions, from time to time, in other dioceses than my own. For all who have any experience, know that he can most effectually minister to a soul, build it up, speak to it, comfort it, who knows the whole extent of its griefs."

Mr. Maskell must have overlooked this.

Of course, if I "continued to receive confessions from time to time in other dioceses than my own," I must "have gone there for that purpose." But my object in that and other passages was, to explain how I came originally to receive confessions in distinct places. The impression which I wished to remove was one, given, I have understood, by some Roman Catholics, as though I had been roving about in different Dioceses, as a sort of Missionary for promoting confession, actively employed in propagating and extending the use of it. I thought, too, that an expression which had been used, "by encouraging every where, if not enjoining, auricular confession," rather favoured the idea, that I had been very widely engaged in actively promoting confession. I believe that that for which God has chiefly and more directly employed me, has been to awaken people's consciences. My first aim in my ministry in this respect, has been to lead people to deeper repentance, to a review of life with a view to a deeper knowledge of themselves, of their besetting sins, of their own sinfulness, and of God's loving-kindness. This has very often issued in confession; but to promote confession has not been my object. Those who have used confession with me, have sought me to this end, not I them. But any one who knows what it is to a soul to make a "general confession" of the sins of a whole life, knows how much more to whom that confession has been made, can speak to its inmost self, how much more of comfort he can minister to it, knowing its past as well as its present sorrows, than another. On this ground, I have gone again to some distant places, to receive the confessions of those whose confessions I had once received. This was notorious enough; and this in effect I stated. So far from wishing to withhold the fact of my "continuing to receive confessions in" some "other Dioceses" than that in which I live (there are three), I stated it.

(2, b.) In like way, as to individual cases of confession. What I meant to state was the general outline of what I had done. The impression which I wished to remove did not relate to individual cases, further than that I never did what is ordinarily meant by the word "enjoin³." I could not pretend to recollect each separate case during a period of some twelve years. To individuals when they came to me, I have given that advice to each which their cases seemed to me to need. But I meant, and mean to state, that as far as I know, the outline of my practice, when persons have come to me, has been, to learn from themselves what their object was. I have ascertained from them that they sought not advice only, but to use confession; and I did not myself first name or suggest it. This rapid spread of confession had seemed to me so wonderfully the work of God, without human agency, that, knowing that He bestows pardon and grace, in some cases, on repentance, without confession to man, in others, through absolution, I waited to see whether God had drawn them. I was anxious, also, not to perplex persons or disquiet them by suggesting to them individually what they might not have been led to think of. On one occasion, I recollect that a person who came to me for advice about confession, went away for the time without it, because he did not name it. When people have spoken to me, as having a doubt whether they ought not to use confession, I have suggested to them to pray God to teach them His will for them with regard to it. I would by no means say that, in single cases, I may not have felt certain—from my knowledge of the individual character, from the statements of the individuals, from hints dropped by them, from my experience of the benefit of confession in similar cases, and, still more, from persons' own suspicion that they needed it—that it would be the remedy for them. There may, very likely, have been a few such cases, but they have been such exceptional cases, that at this moment I recollect but two, in which I strongly recommended confession. There may have been more. Of course, I never recommended to any one to use it with myself, nor did I ever receive a confession from any one as a sudden act, or upon impulse. I say this, in consequence of Mr. Maskell's statement:—"He [Mr. Dodsworth] knew also, as I know, that to say merely that you have encouraged it, would fall as far short of what your actual practice is, as the word enjoin, in the sense of compelling, would exceed it. He knew that you have done more than encouraged confession in very many cases: that you have warned people of the danger of deferring it—have insisted on it as the only remedy—have pointed out the inevitable danger of the neglect of it, and have promised the highest blessings in the observance, until you had brought penitents in fear and trembling upon their knees before you ⁴."

Of these "very many cases," I know two only in which I strongly recommended it, and even urged it. One was a case of habitual depression, in which, for years, there seemed to be a secret grief which preyed upon the mind, although of what kind I have not the least idea. The individual used confession, not with me, but with Mr. Maskell. The event showed, I believe, that the counsel was right. I allude to this case thus generally, because I know nothing of it, except that there was deep and notorious depression; and that depression was, I believe, by God's mercy, removed. In the other, the confession was used after some months, as the result of the person's own convictions. But I do most solemnly protest against any such allusions to private histories, which ought to be so very sacred. In any case in which I knew any details independently of confession, I should be bound to be silent by the sacredness of my trust, and the common feelings of the human heart. If confession had been used with me, it would be a simple duty, as one would avoid deadly sin, to be wholly silent as to the whole case; and I say even thus much, only because I have not the remotest idea to what Mr. Maskell is alluding, and so I cannot myself be referring to it. All knowledge of the soul which any one has who receives confessions (even when that knowledge does not come through confession) is so sacred, that it becomes an absolute duty, not, however distantly, to refer to that case, if it could be, by any possibility, known to whom one is referring⁵. I should not think it right even to state, as to any case to which Mr. Maskell might think right to refer, that I omit what would materially explain the advice which I gave. I will have nothing to do with any such statements, let what will be said.

Mr. Maskell speaks of "my not having feared, upon my own sole responsibility, to occupy the awful tribunal of penance." But in no other sense did I this than did Mr. Maskell himself, or, as I know, very many other English Priests, who received those who came to them. More may have come to me, perhaps, than to most; but the principle is the same. I did not receive them on my own responsibility. I shrank from the office, God knoweth; but "necessity was laid upon me." People came to me, and I received them, as did others, and as we felt bound to do, by virtue of the words so often cited. These words imposed a duty upon those to whom others came to "open their griefs." What could any of us do, when one came to us and said, "I have a burden upon my conscience; I need to use confession. The Church tells me to come to the Parish Priest, or 'to some other.' I come to you; will you hear me?" It was in this way that any of us began to receive confessions. And, as I said, those who at first chiefly came to me, Priests or Scholars, had no other to whom to go in preference. This was long before one word had been taught as to Absolution by any of us. People came, as taught by the Church in the Prayer Book, or by our older divines, such as those whom I have mentioned. My own sermons before the University on this subject were some eight years after I had begun to receive the confessions of those who came to me. All alike, Priests and Laymen, understood the words in the same sense, including those who sent this letter to me, until Mr. Allies narrowed them unduly, and without authority, in his pamphlet on the Supremacy. It has always seemed to me, that a Priest who had knowledge on this subject ought to have some special good reason, not for receiving, but for sending those away who came to him by virtue of the permission of the Church. If it is free to persons to come to any priest, it seems to me a duty incumbent on that priest (unless there be any weighty ground to the contrary) to receive those who in a matter so tender, prefer to come to him.

(2, c.) Mr. Maskell further implies that I "recommended and urged such confessions as a part of the spiritual life, and among religious duties; not in order to quiet the conscience before receiving the Communion ;” and in illustration of this he mentions “a case within his own knowledge, two years ago, in which a young person who hesitated to go to Communion without previous confession was directed by Dr. Pusey to go to Communion, and he would receive her confession the following week. This person was in the habit of confessing.”

I must again protest against this dragging forward of individual cases, which cannot be explained adequately without details which are sacred.

Again, I will not say one word to identify the individual. But, if I know the case, there were reasons connected with the character of Mr. Maskell’s mind and teaching, which made me (knowing that in this case there was nothing to hinder the grace of the Sacrament) think that it would be better that the confession should be delayed, than made to Mr. Maskell ; since God accepts as done what is delayed for the well-being of the soul who delays it. The confession, however, was made to Mr. Maskell.

I have stated already that the continuance of confessions originated entirely with those who made them. I have stated also fully to a Bishop in whose diocese I have heard confessions, these two points : 1) that in a first confession it very commonly happens that the person is so much occupied with his sins, that he is not at the time thinking of Holy Communion, but of that of which our Homily says, “Absolution hath the promise,” “forgiveness of sins.” Such, when they use confession, feel themselves unfit to approach Holy Communion; but they have before them a more immediate pressure, that which our Prayer Book speaks of, “the burthen of their sins.” Our Lord has taught them through Holy Scripture, that “what is loosed on earth” by those to whom He has given authority, is “loosed in heaven;” “whose sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them;” and so their first desire is “the benefit of Absolution,” i. e. forgiveness of sins. Absolution is to such the vestibule to Holy Communion. Such cannot come to the Holy Communion with a full trust in God, and a quiet conscience, which the Church says is “requisite.” Absolution is to such introductory to Holy Communion, only not simply so. It is so, because it has a promise given by our Lord, “Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them.” But this is only to say that it is so, because it is a means of grace, “and their offences are pardoned in heaven whose faults you, ‘His Priests,’ on earth forgive⁶.” It enables persons to come to the Holy Communion with a quiet conscience, because Absolution has benefits, “great benefits⁷.” It sets the mind at peace with God, because “our⁸ Lord Jesus Christ hath left power to His Church to absolve all sinners who truly repent and turn to Him.”

“Not,” of course, in St. Cyprian’s words⁹, that we “anticipate the judgment of the Lord Who will come to Judge, but that if He shall find a sinner’s penitence full and entire, He will then ratify what has been determined by us.” So, then, it is a blessing in itself, absolution from sin, and introductory to a further blessing, “spiritually to eat the Flesh of Christ, and drink His Blood; to dwell in Christ, and Christ in us; to be one with Christ, and Christ with us.”

2) The other point which I explained was that of repeated confessions. This too, I explained, originated entirely with those who had used confession. They (as I publicly stated in my Sermon before the University) “long mostly to continue to open their griefs for slighter sins, into which they may afterwards fall. Is such an one to be repelled? Is he to be told that the remedy he seeks for is only for those more deeply wounded, or bid go into other folds, if he still would have it¹?”

I stated, then, to that Bishop, that persons could often go to Communion with a quiet conscience, for some time, without confession, who yet would not go with a quiet conscience, if they were deprived of confession altogether. I said, that, in consequence, I did receive confessions from such persons from time to time, although they did go to Holy Communion in the mean season. And certainly the English

Church cannot require of her children that they should confess their sins before every Communion, or not at all; since even the Roman does not require confession before every Communion.

On the other hand, when a person has in ignorance spoken of Confession only as a means of "guidance," I have said, of course, that not "guidance," but absolution, was the object of confession, and that it would be to pervert the institution of Christ to use it merely for "guidance." The knowledge of the soul, which is so acquired, of course, enables the Priest to give "ghostly counsel and advice;" but such must not be the end of confession. I mention this, because I suspect that some of the objections to confession are founded upon the idea that it is used simply as a means of spiritual discipline, not because souls need it for the quieting of the conscience.

But again, it were much to be wished that, if any in authority should be inclined to lay down that confession of sins and absolution ought only to be used by the sick, or with reference to Holy Communion, they would consider whether they would not thereby lay a yoke upon tender consciences, and narrow the freedom left by their predecessors from the Reformation, until now. Of those cited above, or in my letter, or by Mr. Wordsworth, in his sermon on Evangelical Repentance, the Bishops or Archbishops Latimer, Ridley, Jewell, Andrewes, Moreton, White, Laud, Montagu, Usher, Bramhall, Sparrow, Taylor, and Dr. Crakanthorpe, Donne, Heylin, Hammond,

South, Comber, Leslie, recommend confession for quiet of conscience², for instruction, correction, comfort³, to the weak, wounded, and ignorant conscience⁴, comfort of God's pardon⁵, absolution⁶, forgiveness of sins⁷, a help to penitence⁸, without any reference whatsoever to Holy Communion. I may add another passage from Bishop Taylor, in which, in his "Rules and Advices to the Clergy of Down and Connor", he sets down, "Let every minister exhort his people to a frequent confession of their sins."

A more authoritative document than these, the homilies, say expressly, that "Absolution hath the promise of forgiveness of sins," although "by the express word of the New Testament, it hath not this promise annexed and tied to the visible sign, which is imposition of hands. For this visible sign (I mean laying on of hands) is not expressly commanded in the New Testament to be used in absolution, as the visible signs in Baptism and the Lord's Supper are; and therefore absolution is no such sacrament as Baptism and the Communion are."

In like way, when speaking against their auricular confession (that of the Roman Catholics), the homily of repentance speaks of it with a view to the relief of conscience, wholly irrespectively of Holy Communion. "I do not say but that, if any do find themselves troubled in conscience, they may repair to their learned curate or pastor, or to some other godly learned man, and show the trouble and doubt of their conscience to them, that they may receive at their hand the comfortable salve of God's word; but it is against the true Christian liberty, that any man should be bound to the numbering of his sins, as it hath been used heretofore, in the time of blindness and ignorance."

But, besides all this, those of our divines who do speak of confession with reference to Holy Communion, by no means restrain it to this one occasion. Bishop Cosin, e. g. mentions it as one of the precepts of the Church that it should be so used; but he puts down among the "points¹ of agreement with the Church of Rome," "in public or private absolution of penitent sinners." Hooker sets forth the two occasions in which the Church of England recommends confession; yet he does not² speak as one who would make confession preparatory only to

Holy Communion, nor for very grievous sins only; "Having first the promises of God for pardon generally unto all offenders penitent; and particularly for our own unfeigned meaning, the infallible testimony of a good conscience; the sentence of God's appointed officer and vicegerent, to approve with impartial judgment the quality of that we have done, and, as from His tribunal, in that respect to assail us of any crime: I see no cause but that by the rules of our faith and religion we may rest ourselves very well assured touching God's most merciful pardon and grace; Who, especially for the strengthening of weak, timorous, and fearful minds, hath so far endued His Church with power to absolve sinners. It pleaseth God that men sometimes should, by missing this help, perceive how much they stand bound to Him for so precious a benefit enjoyed. And surely, so long as the world lived in any awe or fear of falling away from God, so dear were His ministers to the people, chiefly in this respect, that being through tyranny and persecution deprived of pastors, the doleful rehearsal hath not any thing more eminent, than that sinners distressed should not know how or where to unlade their burden. Strange it were unto me, that the Fathers, who so much every where extol the grace of Jesus Christ in leaving unto His Church this heavenly and divine power, should, as men whose simplicity had generally been abused, agree all to admire and magnify a needless office."

Archbishop Sharpe says, again³, without limitation, “As for confession to a Minister (though that is always lawful, and sometimes highly expedient; and if people among us did more practise it, there is no doubt they would find both great comfort and great benefit thereby, yet) it cannot reasonably be thought to be intended in this place.” (Prov. xxviii. 13.) And in the place recently quoted by the Bishop of London: “The Papists do very unjustly traduce and calumniate the Reformation, when they say that the Protestants are against private Confession. There is no such thing. There is no Protestant Church but gives it that due esteem and regard that it ought to have. All that they have done is to regulate it; to set it upon its true basis and foundation, which is done, not by requiring private confession as a thing necessary, but exhorting men to it as a thing highly convenient in many cases. In all those instances where it can be useful, or serve any good purpose, it is both commended and seriously advised; that is to say, where a sinner either needs direction and assistance for the overcoming some sin that he labours under, or where he is so overwhelmed with the burden of his sins that he needs the help of some skilful person to explain to him the terms of the Gospel; to convince him from the Holy Scriptures that his repentance (as far as a judgment can be made of it) is true and sincere, and will be accepted by God; and lastly, upon the full examination of his state, and his judgment thereupon, to give him the absolution of the Church. In all cases no Protestant who understands his religion is against private confession; on the contrary, all the best writers of the Protestants, nay, all the public confessions⁴ of the Protestants which give an account of their faith, are mightily for it, and do seriously recommend it."

Equally broad is the statement made by Fuller as quoted by the same Bishop: "Our Church, says Fuller in his 'Moderation of the Church of England,' doth declare the necessity of such a confession as is useful to the purposes of true repentance,—that is, when confession to the Minister of God may be useful for spiritual advice, and for the quieting of any one's conscience, in order to a good life, or a happy death, particularly in order to the fruitful receiving of the Holy Communion."

The point which the homilies and subsequent defenders of the English Church maintain, is, that pardon is not tied to confession. The homilies except against this only, that "a man is not bound to the confession of his sins;" they do not say that he is bound, not to confess his sins to a Priest at all, or that he is bound, not so to confess them, unless there be some sin beyond human infirmity. Jewell says, "Thus much only we say, that private confession to be made unto the Minister is neither commanded by Christ, nor necessary to salvation." He directly disavows interfering with it, or discouraging it. The words of the first Liturgy in the reign of Edward VI. contain the principles on which our chief writers since have spoken, that each should be satisfied with his own conscience. As I have before said: "We⁵ may, then, (whether priests or penitents, or both in one,) have full comfort that the Church of England has denied or abridged nothing of that 'ministry of reconciliation' which God has committed to His Church. Not to constrain confession is not to deny it; to leave it to the penitent's choice, is not to refuse it, if chosen; we are not set free one way, to be limited in the other; freed from the necessity of confession, to be denied, if we crave it, the comforts of special absolution."

Now no Bishop could mean to dissuade any one from confessing in health what the Church would "move him to confess," not upon a death, but upon a sick-bed. What, however, I suppose any Bishop would really mean by restraining confession, would be, that the Church of England did not contemplate confession as a means of discipline of conscience or of advancing in holiness, but only meant it to be used in such cases where the mind was really burthened by sin, and the person felt that he could not come quietly to Holy Communion without it.

Now, if those to whom people have been in the habit of thus coming, were required by Canonical obedience to say to them: "Your Bishop requires you not to come, unless you can say that you could not come with a quiet conscience to Holy Communion without opening your griefs," I do not believe that, in the end, one fewer would come. Every soul knows its own grief. Its grief is what itself feels. The more a soul advances in grace, the tenderer the conscience becomes. It will feel lesser infirmities, more (blessed be God) than others will whole heaps of sins. Every one acquainted with souls knows that there is often most contrition, most anxiety about the soul, most anxiety to have God's sentence of absolution for any slight stain or spot of sin, most careful longing to come "holy and clean to such a heavenly Feast, in the marriage-garment required by God in Holy Scripture," among those who have least of sin. Surely all lives of holy men imply this, that they were far more grieved by what ordinary Christians might think nothing of, than such would be by real grievous falls.

Such a direction might perhaps to some create scruple and perplexity for a time. I think, in the end, it would be more likely to increase confession than to diminish it. It might at first perplex scrupulous consciences, whether they could indeed say that they could not go to Holy Communion with a quiet conscience. After delaying for a time, they would feel that they could not, and so would resume it, as before. It would for the time add perplexity as to confession itself, to any doubts as to their own state with God. But the result would probably be that, having been compelled thus to question with themselves, whether they did need confession, they would come to think that they needed it oftener. It is the result of every appeal of this sort to conscience, that it moves people one way or the other. Surely, since our Church leaves her children free, and as Hooker says, has especial regard to those of "weak, timorous, and fearful minds," our Bishops will not add to any perplexity, by telling them that they cannot have the benefit which they have continually experienced, the lightening, comforting, refreshing of their souls, and through which they have gone to Holy Communion with gladder hearts, and a fuller trust in God's mercy, unless they could distinctly say that they dared not go thither without it.

3. The last point on this head is one in its own nature the most difficult, when the direction of the Church seems to be, or is, in opposition to the will of a parent. The Church requires persons who are confirmed, and of sufficient age, to come to Holy Communion. It says also, "It is requisite that no man should come to the Holy Communion, but with a full trust in God's mercy, and with a quiet conscience;" and then sets forth this mode, of "opening the griefs" with a view to "the benefit of absolution," to those who "cannot" otherwise "quiet their consciences." The Church lays down that the Holy Communion is a Sacrament "necessary to salvation," and that "a quiet conscience" is requisite for those who come to it. And this special mode of quieting the conscience she proposes to each Communicant directly, if they need it; she makes each of them, in their inmost heart, which they and God only know, the judge whether they need this remedy or no. Before, or without, confession, no one besides, not even a parent, can know whether that need exists. A parent, perhaps, may be a less good judge than any, because a parent knows all which is good and beautiful, and is withheld often by natural feeling from suspecting any evil. And yet there are often deep, cankering sins, of which parents know nothing, which duty does not bid to reveal to them, and which filial love withholds, in order to save the parent's aching heart. No law of God has made the confession of sins, in mature years, to a parent a part of filial duty. Yet without that very confession, a parent could not in the least judge whether the son or daughter had need to "open their griefs" or no. What, then, if the parent be worldly, or (as may often be) himself wicked, or infidel, and so a hater of all priests and (as he thinks it) priestcraft? or what if he be a dissenter, or if, being a Churchman, he have been educated in vehement prejudice against confession, or think that it will withdraw those who use it from the Church, or that it is itself a remnant of a "bygone superstition?" It will hardly be held by any one that a son or daughter of mature age

(they might be twenty-five, or thirty-five, or forty-five, or yet more, and their parent still alive) would be required by the fifth commandment, either to abstain from Holy Communion, which is "necessary to salvation," or from quieting the conscience, which the Church of England says is "requisite," in this way, which she encourages. Of course, in putting these cases, I am not alluding to any special instance. It is enough that such cases must frequently happen in this world of sin. Those born of dissenters very often join the Church; those born of worldly or ungodly parents are very often touched by God's grace; irreligious and profligate husbands have, very often, wives earnest about their husbands' salvation and their own. One might instance the hatred of the French infidel, Michelet, who is mad against confession, because the wives and mothers of France, taught by their priests, win their husbands and sons from infidelity. It cannot then be contended, that a child or wife can be bound by the will of a parent or husband, to forego what, in their own conviction, is necessary to their spiritual being. If they in their own minds come under the direction of the Church in her exhortation, the authority of the husband or parent is subordinate to that of the Church, since the parent or husband are themselves subject to the law of the Church. This I have not hesitated to say. But I do believe that in most cases, if it be right to bring such a matter before a parent or husband at all, neither parent nor husband would force the liberty of conscience of a child or wife. But then, one knows too well what deep pain and soreness such concessions, obtained through the suffering of the child, may leave. Again, there are cases in which the very health of parents in advanced years might be injured by anxiety about what yet the son or daughter might know to be necessary to "quiet their conscience." I have, at times, concurred in the feeling that it was most consistent with filial duty, in persons of mature years, and fully entitled and qualified to judge in such a matter of conscience for themselves, not to mention to their parent an act which they felt to be necessary to themselves, but the knowledge of which would probably be a source of pain and distress, and lasting discomfort. I did not counsel such withholding in any other sense than that of concurring with the judgment that it was best, considering the circumstances of the case. Much less did I "urge arguments" in its favour. But I have fully concurred in silence being kept, when it seemed that the mention of the use of confession might only bring distress upon minds which ought to be cherished. I knew that the grounds which would occasion distress were unfounded, yet I feared that no explanation would remove the pain of undefined fears. At other times, and under other circumstances, I have suggested that the consent of the parent should be obtained. I could say much more, but the details of these histories are, to me at least, sacred. I will only add that I do not know to what

Mr. Maskell refers, when he speaks "of the burning sense of shame and of deceitfulness." I cannot think that any who felt it would have concealed it from me. And certainly no one ever gave me any such impression. "Deceitfulness" would, of course, itself have been matter of confession in one who used confession at all. I need hardly say that I must have advised any one who so felt, to incur any pain, sooner than sin against God ⁶.

I have Mr. Maskell's authority for stating, that when he speaks of "enforced mystery," he did not mean that I had "enforced" it. I wish, for the sake of the holy institution in connexion with which he spoke of it, that he had used language less ambiguous. Perhaps, when he says, "I know how utterly the specious arguments which you have urged have failed to remove their burning sense of shame and deceitfulness," he meant by "urged" that I only used arguments which to me seemed strong. But if he have anyhow come to think, that I ever did more than I have said,—that I went beyond acquiescing in the judgment of one who consulted me, that it was better, under the circumstances, not to mention what would occasion distress, or be misunderstood; if he has thought that I ever recommended mystery, or countenanced deceitfulness, or "urged arguments" upon any doubting or unwilling mind; or wished for any concealment for my own sake (a Priest, of course, must wish for the most entire openness with all the world); or that I ever knew of any serious misgivings (I do not speak of pain, for all such concealment, even when duty and love seemed to require it, must, quite apart from deceit, be most painful); or that I would not, if I could without needless cost of pain to others, have counselled that the use of confession should in all cases be known to parents; or that that knowledge was withheld in any except insulated cases, and that, solely out of regard to the circumstances of the case, and (whether this was best or no) for fear of needless yet unavoidable pain to the parent; or that I ever had the slightest wish to withhold any thing from any Bishop,—he is simply mistaken.

And now, having said thus much once for all, I will not be drawn on by any further hints, to write what, if followed into detail, must involve private and sacred histories. If Bishops authoritatively enjoin that no confessions should be made under any circumstances, at any age, (by young men, for instance, amid all the perils of the world, or by those of mature years, whose parents are still living,) without the cognizance of the parent, be it so. I must, of course, obey. The responsibility, whether of the well-being or of the peace of minds, will be theirs. If they do not, I do not see any thing contrary to morality in simply withholding, under special circumstances, of course without deceit, the knowledge of a fact which could change nothing, but might very probably cause anxiety and disquietude. Mr. Maskell uses this silence as to confession as a ground of impeachment. I will not retort. Mr. Maskell, although he uses this instrument so freely now, well knows that scandal, such as he would affix upon myself, might be retorted, as it is manifoldly urged, against the Communion to which he now belongs. He knows well, that casuistry, although originally it signifies "the doctrine of cases of conscience," is used commonly as a proverb of reproach. And this, because the line between right and wrong is often fine, and, in difficult and complicated cases, may easily be mistaken; and as subtle minds may make what is wrong appear to be right, so unjust or prejudiced minds may make what is right appear to be wrong. I know well, that whatsoever may immediately suffer in such unseemly contests, truth and faith suffer more. I mean this, that I have known concealment countenanced by Roman Catholic priests, which has startled me. I do not judge them. I hope well of what they did, i. e. that they did it with a good meaning, although, I think, wrongly. Neither, then, let Mr. Maskell judge me. One gainer there is in all these unseemly contests. It is not the Church of Rome; it is not truth; it is not holiness; it is not love; it is not the kingdom of God and His Righteousness. It is he whose desire it is to have truth evil-spoken of; on whose kingdom Confession, and every other means of holiness, makes an inroad; who puts scoffing into the mouths of the profane, and delights to find occasion for it. For one whom Mr. Maskell will unsettle by such instruments as these, he will make private confession odious to a hundred, and give occasion to scoffing to a thousand, who will read his attack as it is commented upon in newspapers, and will jest profanely at priests and priestcraft.

Mr. Maskell says,—“ It is not, I think, true, that the practice of auricular confession by English [Roman] Catholics is ‘ especially retiring : ’ ” and therefore he would infer that it ought not to be in the English portion of the Church Catholic. But there must and ought to be a difference, when any practice is enjoined as a duty by the Church, and when it is left to the individual conscience. The difference is the same between public and private prayer. To neglect what the Church enjoins, is profane ; to do publicly what the Church leaves to be a private act, is ostentatious. The same rule of piety enjoins to go to church twice on the Sunday, and forbids, e. g., to observe one of the Canonical hours of prayer, “ standing in the corners of the streets.” If a Roman Catholic were to neglect confession, it would be a profane contempt of the law of the Church. If an English Catholic uses it—since the Church, as of old, leaves it to his choice—it must be because he feels the need more, or his conscience is more scrupulous, or he has been led to know of the benefit it would be to him, or, it might be, because his conscience is grieved with the sense of some past sin. But all these are concerns of the soul, with which man, "curious⁷ to know the lives of others, slothful to amend his own," has nothing to do. Why should any one expose himself to have his private, solemn, sacred actions commented upon? What need is there? Holy Scripture does not command it. The Church says, "let him come unto me, or to some other discreet and learned Minister;" it does not say "in the presence of the congregation." Nor need it be strange, that any of those who use confession should not now ordinarily speak of it, now that (not, I must say, through human agency) it has suddenly so increased, that it might be painfully or lightly spoken of by those who, not using it, cannot understand its use. Nor ought Roman Catholics to taunt us with this. A very grave Roman Catholic writer had to remonstrate against personal lightness of speech as to confession, even among Priests. "Much⁸ less ought you to allow yourselves to jest at table and before secular persons, saying, for instance, to a maid-servant, 'Well! did you tell every thing? has your confessor given you a good penance?' This Sacrament is too high to be made matter of jest."

I know that very many do not speak of their using confession, just as they would not speak of the length of their private prayers, or their hours or times of prayer, or the devotions which they use, because it is sacred between them and God.

⁸ Prêtre Sanctifié, in the Manuel des Confesseurs, p. 468.

Akin to these charges, is an objection which Mr. Maskell makes, as to the title of my book—"The Church of England leaves her children free to whom to open their griefs." He says, "'Auricular Confession' is, I know well, a phrase very disagreeable in the ears of members of the Established Church; it is, usually, ominous of dark practices, and secret correspondence, and mischievous influences, and other things of that sort. Still there is something so inadequate in the expression 'to open their griefs;' something in its tone and primary meaning, it must be said, falling so short of what is generally understood, and rightly understood, by 'auricular confession,' or even by 'confession' only; something, as it were, distinct and different from the Catholic practice;—that it is not unlikely to mislead many. Even if you were determined to avoid the term 'auricular confession,' yet it would more clearly have described your object, and stated the question better, as it appears to me, to have openly asserted that 'the Church of England leaves her children free to choose their own confessor.'"

Mr. Maskell forgets that the words "auricular confession," which he says do occur four times in my letter, do not occur once in that addressed to me by himself and others. He blames me for not using a particular phrase which had not been used in the letter to me, which he had himself subscribed. The question put to me turned on the meaning of the words in the Prayer Book, quoted to me, "Let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned minister of God's word, and open his grief," &c. It was contended that these words were to be limited in a certain way. Why might I not use the same term in my title, in which I proved (as I believe) that they were not so limited? "The Church of England leaves her children free to whom to open their griefs." Mr. Maskell says "it falls so short of what is generally understood, and rightly understood, by 'auricular confession,' or even by 'confession' only." Now does Mr. Maskell really mean, that in a book full of references to the authorities about "receiving confessions,"—in which I speak myself, again and again, of my own "receiving confessions"—there could be any doubt about the meaning? I have not, in the least, avoided any technical language, when it was needed to clear the subject. But there was no such need in choosing a title, which (as the wont of the day is, and as is necessary if the book is to reach those who need it) had to be advertised in newspapers. I did purposely choose a title, which speaks of confession in the words of our Prayer Book, and which suggested that confession was treated of as a relief to oppressed consciences, rather than what the world speaks of—priestly dominion over people's consciences, "priestly power," "sacerdotal rights," &c.

The subject of the book was about the "freedom" which the Church of England leaves to her children. How is it inconsistent with charity or truth to express this only? The word "auricular confession" is not made essential either by Holy Scripture or by the Church. The Roman Church itself does not require its use. It does not, I believe, occur in the Decrees or Canons of the Council of Trent. It looks like anxiety to find fault, thus to criticize a title-page. It has been noticed, how even St. Athanasius has avoided terms which would not be so readily received by those for whom he wrote. "One of the characteristic points in Athanasius, is his constant attention to the sense of doctrine, or the meaning of writers, in preference to the words used. Thus he scarcely uses the symbol ὁμοούσιον, 'one in substance,' throughout his Orations, and in the de Synod. acknowledges the Semi-Arians as brethren⁹."

Mr. Maskell may now leave me my choice, in what way I think best, with the blessing of God, to teach truth in the Church which he has abandoned.

Mr. Maskell thinks it worth while even to notice the fact, that I did not address my answer to any of those who wrote to me. Now that he has published the letter, I will say that the simple reasons were, that I did not wish to force the publication of the joint letter, nor to publish the names¹ of those who subscribed it, as I must have done by an answer to the writers. This I wished to avoid, believing that the real question had been overlooked or mis-stated in the joint letter, and that the doubt raised was utterly unsupported on the real principles of the Church. I stated, however,—“I have also been called upon in a written letter to answer the same question, with the intimation that the writers ‘purposed to make public both their question and my answer.’”

Mr. Maskell says, “We should not be strictly correct in simply saying, without any limitation of discretion, that we purposed to make public both [our] question and [your] answer.” Yet these are the words which were used:—“We cannot suppose that you will be surprised that we should earnestly desire from you an elucidation of this matter, and that we purpose to make public both our questions and your answer.” This peremptory declaration, “we purpose to make public your answer,” compelled me to write, not in the way of hints, which might suffice for persons acquainted with the subject, but for the public, to whom I was told my answer would be given.

But all this is tiresome, wearisome personality, which does not, in the least, bear upon the subject at issue.

I have not, in the above pages, entered into the subject of Mr. Dodsworth’s public letter to myself, except as to two expressions as to my practice of receiving confessions which I thought might be misunderstood. For I did not wish to mix up with this question, questions in no way connected with it, except that they too were addressed to myself. Mr.

Maskell draws attention to the fact that those questions have remained unanswered². He himself, with others, occasioned this. I began to answer that former letter fully, as soon as I had published a portion of my tract on the Royal Supremacy. But I had scarcely had time to begin this answer, when it was followed by the joint letter upon the subject of Absolution. I could not but at once put aside a letter which concerned myself personally, in order to answer fully a letter, which, I knew, if unanswered, would shake through and through hundreds of tender consciences. I could not (as I have already explained) give suggestions only as to the answer, since I had been peremptorily told, "We purpose to make public both our questions and your answer;" and since Mr. Maskell had recently published the letters of the Archbishop of Canterbury, I had the less reason to think that the meaning was less distinct than the words sounded. The tenor of those other inquiries of Mr. Maskell, which evidently were made with no other view than that of obtaining such answers as he knew beforehand that he should receive, left me the less ground to think that in him I should find any thing but a skilful adversary. I had mean time answered in the "Guardian" the appeal made to me by Mr. Dodsworth as far as related to the line which I had taken amid the troubles pressing upon us. Mr. Dodsworth's direct appeal, whether I should continue to teach whatever I had taught, was incidentally answered by that very statement, viz. that there had been no change of principle whatever. When I had finished my letter to Mr. Richards, the time for explaining the meaning of any of the statements incidentally made by Mr. Dodsworth seemed to some whom I consulted to be past; and I was glad to be freed from the necessity of reverting to the painful censure of a friend.

The recent allusion, as it seems, to part of that statement in the Bishop of London's Charge, makes it a duty, as soon as I am free from other duties, to offer an explanation publicly to that Bishop.

There is another subject not connected with the question raised, but one which touches upon a very tender chord of the English mind. Mr. Maskell says, "All that need be said is, that the rules of the Church of Rome, and no other, are your rules; rules which the common cry of Protestants, and the voices of countless ministers and bishops of your communion, have denounced in terms so blasphemous and fearful, that they are not to be spoken of."

This has been understood to mean, that I also have found it necessary to ask those who confess, questions about their sins. I have done so whenever it was necessary; but always, I may say, at the wish of the persons themselves. Those who came to me have always wished to confess their sins fully; they dreaded to confess partially or untruly.

One who wishes to be healed, wishes his whole sickness to be known. This is a rule not of the Church of Rome, but of the early Church, that sins are not to be kept back out of shame³. But this I may say with confidence, (for this is the point which people have in their minds,) that no one has learnt through me the knowledge of any sin, while, by God's mercy, persons have through me, and through others, learnt that to be exceeding sin, which, destructive as it is, they did not know to be sin. They have learnt it to be sin, and repented and forsaken it.

It may be observed, further, that since confession is voluntary with us, those who come, themselves wish to be asked questions. It is a help to them, at least at first. I do not say that this is not the case in the Roman Church. It would be so with every true penitent. They wish in "opening their griefs" really to "open" them, and to this end they are grateful for such questions as may enable them to do so.

On this subject I may insert anew here what I said in the preface to my first University Sermon on Absolution, since it is at this moment out of print.

"The young need to be warned, not only against sin which they know, but against sin which they scarcely suspect to be sin. It will not be thought, that such strong language as has been used in this Sermon⁴, was used lightly in the House of God, in His immediate Presence, and as His Minister. People speak commonly of the evils of Confession, as likely, or in some cases actually having conveyed to the soul, knowledge of evil. And it is painfully true that, in unskilful hands, in other countries, conducted in a dry technical way, it has⁵. But they forget that there are those around youth by whom they are more likely to be taught evil, than by the Priest; there is one nearer still to the soul, whose unceasing object it is, not to guard against it, but to instil and

⁵ It is admitted with sorrow and indignation in Manuals, which warn earnestly against carelessness so terrible, as Bailly, t. iv. p. 257, sqq. ed. 6. [I said, "other countries," because the books from which I quoted, are those "of other countries," and therefore I did not speak of this, as to which I had no documents at hand. I will add here, however, the following rules from Dens, because it is stigmatized on this very ground. "Let the Confessor beware," says the Pastorale of Mechlin, 44, "that he detain not any one, especially the young of either sex, with curious or useless questions; or imprudently ask others what they are ignorant of, lest they receive offence, and learn thence to sin." It gives rules of Aquinas, "That no explicit question be put as to sins, save as to those known to all; as to others the question ought to be put remotely, so that if he committed it, he may say; if he have not, he may not learn:" and "Tertium, ut in peccatis præcipue carnalibus, non descendat nimis ad particulares circumstantias non necessarias, ne sibi et pœnitenti noceat. Quapropter in instructionibus monentur Confessarii, ut parcè, castè, et cautè interrogent circa peccata carnis; et ut pœnitentium nomina non inquirant, nec vultum aspiciant." De Conf. n. 90. ed. 2.]

suggest it. Evil is mostly diligent in propagating itself; one evil companion does often a world of evil; the good are tacitly a burthen to the bad, so the bad instinctively seek to make others like themselves. It is a great trial not to be ashamed of ignorance, even of evil. ‘Amongst my equals,’ says St. Augustine⁶ of his heathen youth, ‘I was ashamed of a less shamelessness.’ Be the physician removed, lest he inadvertently poison his patients, if there be no risk, that the poison, introduced from other sources, shall work more secretly and more fatally! But again this is not the fear to which our nation is exposed; it can be avoided by ordinary caution and cleanness of heart. Purity of soul is guarded by Him Who gives it; it is not easily injured even by one unskilful; where it exists, it carries its own evidence; it is not blighted by all the foulness of the world, much less will it be by the Priests of God.

“But be it (as people think) a choice of evils, as there must be evil, wherever there is human infirmity and ignorance, and this there must be in things ministered by man. And yet let people bring before themselves, that it is a choice of evil; that all evil and peril does not lie on the side of sacred intercourse with God’s Priests⁷; that the

⁷ As much has been said of late very offensively on this subject, it may be mentioned that, in the “Manuel des Confesseurs,” there are given, from the “Prêtre Sanctifié,” special cautions as to world and Satan are busy, and with dreadful success; and then let them weigh which is safest,—to leave the soul open to the inroads of the world and Satan, or to guard it, even though ‘he who is to watch for the soul’ be liable to occasional error. The writer is almost ashamed to say so much; but the deep suspicion fostered unhappily in the English mind, by which their holiest earthly affections are enlisted against the very remedy for sore existing evil, made it a duty to speak plainly, and to make one strong protest against it. Let this be said; they who, through ministering to such as after sin have again been brought back to God, have known their whole sorrowful history, have had no doubt, that, humanly speaking, in most cases, early confession would, by the blessing of Almighty God, have saved them from their sin and misery; and then let men think whether it be not possible, that this suspicion of confession may be sowed by the father of lies himself, in order to keep his own kingdom undisturbed, and carry on his ravages in the soul unhindered.

“les interrogations sur la pureté avec les enfans, avec les adultes et les personnes mariées.” (p. 157, 158.) It is advised to risk incomplete confession, rather than risk conveying knowledge of evil to one ignorant of it. Again, there and elsewhere, special warning is given not to mention the circumstances of any such sins. S. Charles Borromeo gives cautions to the same effect, ib. p. 196. The “Manuel” is the work chiefly used in France; the “Prêtre Sanctifié,” has been sanctioned at Rome also. Bailly (probably, in the passage lately referred to, to prove the contrary) gives most earnest admonitions as to caution “ne juniores ea doceantur quæ feliciter ignorabant.”—T. iv. p. 257. ed. 6.

“ We do not disuse medicines for the body because poisons have been administered through carelessness, or disorders wholly mistaken, and so treated as to bring death, not life, or even the infection of mortal diseases been unsuspectingly conveyed; nor do men cease to take advice as to their estates, because ignorant or dishonest lawyers have at times ruined their clients. People are content to run risks in one case, because they value their lives or estates: they magnify the risks in the other, because they either value not their souls, or dislike the cure, or think they cannot be lost. ‘One we must have,’ says Bp. Andrewes⁸, ‘to know thoroughly the state of our lands or goods; one we must have, entirely acquainted with the state of our body: in our souls it holdeth not! I say no more; it were good it did!’ ”

Mr. Maskell concludes by pressing the point of the invalidity of certain of the absolutions, which I have pronounced in the form provided by the Church of England, if the clause, “let him come to me or some other,” does not bear me out in receiving those who, supposing it to contain really the leave of the Parish Priest, have come to me by virtue of it.

Mr. Maskell has, in this, entirely overlooked what I said, that if a Priest were to refuse leave against the mind of the Church, that refusal would, of itself, be null. The case was ruled by authorities to which he would defer, in the Roman Church. In the case of the ignorance (or, as it was interpreted by many, the absolute moral unfitness) of the Priest, the law of Urban II., A. D. 1067, continued to the penitent the right of going to some other priest. Some authorities held that by the later Council of Lateran, he was compelled to "ask leave" of that Priest. But what if the Priest refused? There were the two opinions: 1st. That he might confess to God alone within, and so would be forgiven. 2nd. That if the Priest refused leave, he might confess to another Priest⁹. I mention this again, the rather because I imagine that the case which Mr. Maskell has prominently in his mind, is one to which I have referred, in which a Parish Priest, from imperfect instruction as to confession or absolution, would object to the use of confession altogether. I said, "His own pastoral authority¹ is derived from the Church. He cannot employ it lawfully in discouraging that which the Church sanctions."

Such an one would assuredly come under the class of the "ignorant Priest," whose parishioners, it was commonly held, need "neither ask nor obtain leave." Medina expressly adds, "that he may confess to another, when his 'own' priest either refuses (nolit) altogether, or cannot receive his confession²."

And, as has been observed by a recent periodical, it is not casting any imputation upon our Parish

Priests, to think, that not having been called upon to study this part of the cure of souls, many do not come under the character of the idoneus sacerdos, or "the discreet and learned minister of God's word;" so that by the law in use in 1548, a parishioner would, on that ground, be free to go to "some other." Many of us must doubtless, at some time, have had a feeling of pain in reading those words, "me or some other discreet and learned minister," because they implied that we were learned ourselves. And I certainly have at times felt, when persons came to me on the very ground that their own Parish Priests were inexperienced, and that I was held to have more knowledge as to this difficult office, that, after many years' study and experience, it would be mock humility to profess that, in many cases, it might not very probably be true. I do not dwell upon this point, as thinking it at all necessary. There is no proof whatever, that for any individual a super-added leave from the Parish Priest is required, beyond that which he is obliged to give in the Public Service. I do it, simply because it will reduce the number of those to whom Mr. Maskell's observations could apply at all, were they as true as they are unfounded. He must concede, at once, the case of all Priests, since they are permitted by all law, to go to whom they will: he must concede, I suppose, all scholars in the University, since they are under no jurisdiction, and have no Parish Priest: he does concede all who have leave from their Parish Priest, actually, and, I suppose, virtually: he must concede all whose Parish Priest would object on wrong grounds, or who was not, from want of experience, qualified to receive confessions. The residue, after these deductions, would be so small, and would so little correspond with his statement—"The vast majority of those persons to whom you and others have given absolution in this manner,"—that Mr. Maskell may the rather, at least, abstain from language so peremptory, yet so unfounded.

He has overlooked what I put down under the head ex rati habitione, to show that "absolutions³ given bonâ fide, though irregularly, were valid in themselves, unless they were subsequently invalidated." The case which I mentioned from St. Cyprian was far stronger, since the person was there absolved and restored to Communion, not only without, but against, the authority of the Council. The Council maintained the right to invalidate the absolution, but did not. But it will come nearer to Mr. Maskell, to ask on what ground Absolution, given and received in simple faith that such is the meaning of the Church of England,—a meaning which has very often been acted upon, during the last 300 years, and never been contradicted until now⁴,—should not be valid, and all the Roman Catholic absolutions in England, from 1623 to 1655, should not be invalid, seeing that, “after the Council of Trent, the ‘approbation’ of the Bishop was essential to the regulars, and they had it not.” It appears, from the account of Roman Catholic writers, that they might have been invalidated. But, although irregular, they were allowed to be valid; and yet, according to the current principles of the Church of Rome, if they had been originally invalid, they could not be subsequently made valid. It is said, “the circumstance of ‘bonâ fide’ alleviates the weight of this charge.”

I do not need this argument. For Mr. Maskell has not raised any even colourable objection against the absolution which many other English Priests and myself have given in the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to those who came to us by virtue of the Church’s words. But I would commend it to him, before he proceeds further in this controversy; and since he puts the “if,”—“if that one clause of the exhortation of your Church be not indeed a recognition of your practice,”—let him recollect the “if” on his side also: “What if the Church of England did mean by the words ‘let him come to me or some other,’ to give her children a choice?” What is he doing, if he should succeed in deterring persons from “opening their griefs,” or keep them back from repentance; and therefore our Church encourages its members to use confidential confession to their priest, or to any other minister of God’s holy word.”

what he must have known to be an aid in breaking off sins, and hold people longer in the thralldom of sin and Satan's kingdom? What if he keep them from what, by his own experience, he can hardly doubt to be a means of grace, or if he make the heart of the righteous sad, whom God hath not made sad? May God, in His mercy, keep this "woe" from him.

In conclusion, I would ask those who are concerned in this subject, and for whom I write, those who have availed themselves of the provision which the English Church has made for her children, or who suspect that it might be better for them, if they did,—not to think, if I do not prolong this controversy, that it is because I have no further answer to any thing which may be said. All prolonged controversy wears out itself and its readers. The mind is taken away from the main body of evidence produced at first, and which cannot be reproduced with equal vividness and fulness, or is distracted by minor points, and forgets those which are of chief moment in determining the question. I have been given to understand that one thinks his time well employed in attacking me personally. But I may be allowed to use the best of my judgment, or the advice of friends, whether the time and strength which I hope, by God's mercy, to give to His service, would best be employed in prolonging this controversy. I trust that I have said enough to satisfy those who do not wish not to be satisfied. And if further controversy should arise, and I should remain silent, I would pray them to look back patiently at what I have already written, and see, if, out of that, they cannot answer it for themselves. Should any still have real doubts raised in their minds, and they have none nearer at hand to remove them, I would endeavour by God's help, if they would apply to me, publicly or privately to remove them. But, above all, let persons, in these sad days, beware of that temptation of Satan, that, because things can be said on both sides, therefore there is no certain truth. I should think that to most simple minds, the Church's words in this question, as well as in the Baptismal Service, or on the Holy Eucharist, would themselves carry their own answer. People may easily "darken counsel by words without knowledge." But people have often felt that they were tampering with the words of the Prayer Book, even while they could not receive it. I do not say this of Mr. Maskell. But I do think that simple minds, if they do not allow themselves to be bewildered by words, will see that when the Church bids her priests to say, "Let him come to me or some other discreet and learned Minister of God's Word," she does mean to give them a choice to whom they shall go; that she has no reserve in what she says so explicitly; that she does not give her ministers authority to control the leave which she bids them, without limitation, to give; that she, in the concerns of the soul, does not use plain words in an ambiguous meaning; nor hold out a choice which she does not méan to fulfil; nor employ in the things of God, what, in the things of man would be chicanery. People's moral sense will, in this, be an adequate guide.
